

49 16

FEBRUARY 25, 1916

No 543

5 Cents.

FAME AND FORTUNE WEEKLY.

STORIES OF

BOYS THAT MAKE MONEY.

A CHASE FOR A FORTUNE; OR, THE BOY WHO HUSTLED.

By A SELF-MADE MAN.

AND OTHER STORIES

The train was pulling out of the station as Clifford Price darted out on the platform with Fleming and Monkton at his heels. "Stop him! Stop that boy!" roared Monkton. Clif darted for the last car and swung himself aboard.

1957 - 1958
RALPH P. SMITH
BOX 985
LAWRENCE, MASS.

Old dime and nickel novels
Bought Sold
RALPH P. SMITH
Lawrence, Mass.

Box 985

Sun. May. 15. 1932.

BOOKS, MAGAZINES, NOVELS
Bought, Sold and Exchanged. Write for lists
Out of Print Five Cent Novels, Our Specialty
HAROLD G. LORANG, Darien Center, N.Y.

Fame and Fortune Weekly

STORIES OF BOYS WHO MAKE MONEY

Issued Weekly—By Subscription $2.50 per year. Entered at the New York, N. Y., Post Office as Second-Class Matter. by Frank Tousey, Publisher, 168 West 23d Street, New York.

MAR 14 1924

No. 543.

NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 25, 1916.

Price 5 Cents.

A CHASE FOR A FORTUNE — OR — THE BOY WHO HUSTLED

By A SELF-MADE MAN

CHAPTER I.

THE HEIR OF BEECHING HOLLOW.

"Look here, Clif, aren't you the heir to this property?" asked Walter Singleton, looking at his chum very seriously.

"That's a singular question for you to ask, Walt," answered Clifford Price, in a tone of surprise. "Don't you know I am?"

"Well, I always thought you were, of course, since your mother died; but I heard your cousin, Howard Fleming, make a remark to one of his cronies the other day that set me thinking."

"What did he say?" asked Clif, with more than usual earnestness.

"He said that when you came of age you might find considerable difficulty in proving your right to inherit this property."

"He said that, did he?"

"Yes."

"I can't see what ground he had to make any such remark."

"Neither do I."

"My father bought this property many years ago, and expended considerable money improving it. When he made that unfortunate trip West which cost him his life this place had more than doubled in value."

"I believe your mother's brother, Edward Fleming, accompanied your father on that trip," said Singleton.

"He did. But Mr. Fleming was only a half-brother of my mother's. However, I know she always thought a great deal of him, and placed implicit confidence in him."

"She must have, for when he brought back the news of your father's death she practically put him in charge of this estate."

"Well, she really wasn't able to look after it herself. She never was the same after father's death. She grieved constantly up to the hour of her own death a year ago," replied Clif, soberly.

"I understand that your father left everything to your mother."

"That's right."

"And your mother died without making a will?"

"No will was found. It may, however, still be in existence, for Mr. Goodrich, father's lawyer, said he drew one for her, making me her sole heir. It doesn't matter, as Mr. Fleming did not put in any claim for himself. The court appointed him my guardian, and he gave bonds for the faithful discharge of his duties."

"Mr. Fleming evidently regards you as the rightful heir."

"Of course. I don't see why he shouldn't."

"Then why should his son make such a peculiar remark?"

"That's what puzzles me."

"He must have some reason for it. He spoke in such a significant way that it instantly attracted my notice."

"Howard and I don't pull very well together, so I dare say he'd like to see me done out of this property. But as the law clearly makes me the chief heir of my mother without a will, and as Mr. Fleming, who is her only living relative, has waived his claim to any part of this estate to which he may have been entitled, I can't see what is to prevent my coming into possession when I reach my majority."

"Nor I," replied Singleton.

"Well, let's drop the subject. How are we going to amuse ourselves this afternoon?"

"Suppose we go up to the Crow's Nest, taking a rope with us, and explore the Devil's Chimney. I'm just in the mood for such an adventure, and we might find that red pocket-book, with the valuable diamond ring in it, accidentally dropped down there last summer by Mr. Fleming."

"I'm with you, Walt," replied Clif, with some enthusiasm. "I like anything that has a spice of danger in it. There's a long, stout rope in our barn that will be just the thing for us to use. I'll go and fetch it and meet you at the gate."

"Hold on a moment," said Singleton, as Clif started off.

"Well?" answered Price, stopping.

"Maybe we'd better not do it."

"Why not?"

"I remember now that we were going to try and find that pocketbook soon after Mr. Fleming dropped it and he forbade you to make the attempt. In fact, if I remember rightly, he ordered you to keep away from the Crow's Nest altogether. He said it was too dangerous a spot for you to go to. The Chimney is a matter of two hundred feet deep, and he said a misstep might cost you your life. I don't want to encourage you to go contrary to your guardian's wishes."

"Pooh! I'm a year older now, and able to look out after myself. I've always wanted to investigate the inside of the Chimney, and this afternoon is as good a time to do it as any other, if you're game to go with me as you proposed."

"I'm game, all right, only—"

"Don't you worry about me going contrary to Mr. Fleming's orders. He gives a good many orders that he hasn't any business to do. With a strong rope of good length, well anchored around the base of the scarred pine tree near the mouth of the Chimney, there isn't any particular danger to a pair of stout chaps like us, who are used to the rugged slopes in this neighborhood. Didn't we climb up the Witches' Ravine a few weeks ago, without any rope at all? When I told Mr. Fleming about it he never made a kick, although in many ways it's a great deal more dangerous than the Chimney with a rope to rely on. Mr. Fleming rather encourages these expeditions of ours, with the single exception of the Chimney. He's so violently opposed to that as to make me all the more eager to go there, if only to prove to him that we can go all through it without getting a scratch."

Singleton made no further objection.

As a matter of fact he was only too anxious to explore the recesses of the Chimney.

The boys had been about everywhere in the rugged range of picturesque mountains which surrounded in horseshoe shape the village of Macedonia where they lived.

Both were good-looking, courageous lads, of eighteen years. Strong-limbed, active as cats, and with muscles hard as rock, acquired by constant exercise at outdoor sports and rugged expeditions among the mountain slopes and defiles, they were as well fitted to attempt the exploration of the famous Devil's Chimney as any mountaineer, almost.

Hitherto the boys had refrained from tackling the Chimney on account of Mr. Fleming's injunction to the contrary.

He told Clif that he could not afford to permit the heir of Beeching Hollow to risk his life in any such madcap adventure.

What would people think of him, he said, if he did so and anything serious happened to the boy?

As the property would by law revert to him in case of Clif's death, would not gossip spread about ugly insinuations as to his object in the matter?

Of course it would, and his reputation was bound to suffer.

Clif would have appreciated the apparently friendly interest in his welfare shown by his guardian but for the fact that Mr. Fleming made no objection to his expeditions to the Witches' Ravine, nor to several other wild and dangerous spots in the range.

He could not quite understand just why Mr. Fleming put so much stress on the Chimney, and yet placed no prohibition on the other places.

It was singular, to say the least, and it set the boy to wondering whether his guardian didn't have some special reason, which he did not care to disclose, for wishing to keep him away from that particular part of the mountain.

The loss of the red pocketbook had caused Mr. Fleming a good deal of perturbation, and he had made many attempts to recover it from the recesses of the Chimney.

Time and again he had taken a man up there with a strong rope ladder and had made the descent himself to various depths in an unavailing endeavor to find his precious wallet.

He had given out that the diamond ring it contained was not only valuable, but a priceless heirloom whose loss he regarded as a great misfortune.

At the same time he discouraged the efforts of any outsider to look for it, on the ground that he regarded the search as altogether too dangerous, and because he claimed that he alone knew just where to hunt for it and hoped eventually to find it.

To still further dissuade a search, he refused to offer any reward for its recovery.

Although Clif knew that his guardian would be angry with him for making any attempt to penetrate the mysteries of the Devil's Chimney, even if he were so lucky as to find the pocketbook with its precious contents, yet he was nevertheless determined to go there some time.

Therefore he greeted Walter Singleton's suggestion with avidity, and entered into the expedition that afternoon with the utmost enthusiasm.

Hardly had the two boys left the place where they had been conversing, which was close to the hedge that partially walled in that section of the garden in the front of the Beeching Hollow mansion, than the head of another boy rose above the well-trimmed green border and looked after them.

This boy, who had been hiding within earshot of them, was Howard Fleming, Clif's cousin.

He was a lad whose arrogant disposition and disagreeable manners had rendered him as unpopular with the servants of the place, as well as the boys of the nearby village of Macedonia, as Cliford Price was the reverse.

He was not at all good-looking, and in many respects was a sort of pocket-edition of his father, Edward Fleming.

He was instrumental in bringing charges against most of the old servants with a view to their dismissal, but had failed in his object owing to the vigorous protests of Clif, which carried considerable weight, as Mr. Fleming, for reasons, did not care to antagonize his ward—at least not at that time.

Consequently there was no love lost between Clif and Howard.

The latter hated his bright, handsome cousin all the more on this account, though he was bitter enough against him on general principles—the chief of which was that Clif was the heir to Beeching Hollow.

Recently, however, Howard seemed to have other views concerning his fortunate cousin, and these views afforded him a great deal of secret satisfaction, so much so that he had been betrayed into making the singular remark to a particular friend of his which Walter Singleton had accidentally overheard.

As he stood looking over the hedge behind which he had been for some time concealed, there was a sardonic look on his bilious countenance.

"So, you heard what I said to Ned Barker, did you, Walter Singleton?" he glowered, with an ugly frown, "and you've repeated it to Clif Price. Well, much good may it do both of you. It's the truth, all right. You'll never come into this property, Clif Price, if my father can help it, and I guess he has the scheme almost cut and dried that will put a mighty big spoke into your wheel. Yah! I hate you! I'd like to see you dead and buried in your family vault. Never mind, my turn is coming. One of these days I'll own this place instead of you. Then you'll be working for a living, like you ought to do, while I'll be living on the fat of the land. That will be a glorious satisfaction," and the youth's face wrinkled into a disagreeable smile, and he rubbed his hands together after the fashion of his father. "You two chaps are going up to the Devil's Chimney, eh? I must tell my father at once, I know what you two can do with the help of a rope. You can go anywhere in that place, for you're as sure-footed as the chamois of the Alps. If you weren't you'd have broken your necks long ago in the Witches' Ravine. Father and I have looked to see you do it, for it would have simplified matters for us, but we've been disappointed, worse luck. Father will be right at your heels when I tell him you've gone to explore the Chimney with a rope. Oh, if it wasn't for that red pocketbook, which it might be just your luck to find, neither of us would move a finger to prevent you exploring the Chimney as often as you wanted to. No, no, we'd only be too glad to have you do it, trusting to a loose stone or an insecure crag to wipe you both out, for I hate you, too, Walter Singleton, and I'll have revenge on you yet for the whipping you once gave me for interfering with Bessie Byron, who isn't your girl, anyway."

Howard Fleming hurried away to find his father.

The gardener, however, informed him that Mr. Fleming had just gone to the village on business.

"How unfortunate!" exclaimed Howard, to himself, with a nervous frown. "What's to be done now? Those chaps are on their way up the mountain by this time. If they should happen to find that pocketbook, and look into it for the diamond that isn't there, they would be apt to discover—I can't bear to think of it. The only thing I can do is to follow them myself and see what happens. They may not find the wallet, the chances are against their doing so, but you can't tell what may happen when a fellow has so much luck as Clif Price. At any rate I'll watch and if they should find the pocketbook—"

Howard's face looked absolutely wicked as he mused and shook his fist in the direction of the mountains, then he rushed into the house, went to his room, and after a few minutes came downstairs again, and darted off in the direction taken a short time before by Clif Price and his friend Singleton.

CHAPTER II.

SENT TO HIS DEATH.

"The finest view in the State is to be had from this spot," said Clif to his chum, as they stood on the summit of Crow's Nest and looked around them.

"You're right. That's why a good many tourists come here at this time of the year," replied Singleton.

It was a clear, sunshiny afternoon in the month of July, and as Nature was robed in her summer attire.

On one side, three or four hundred feet below the spot, lay the village of Macedonia, with Beeching Hollow a mile up the horseshoe curvature.

A mile or more in the opposite direction, on a line with the two mountain spurs, could be seen the railroad station on the C. & N. W. trunk road, one of the big American systems connecting the East with the West, and with connecting branches at a dozen points to take one either north or south.

The mountain range, of which the horseshoe at Macedonia was the southwestern terminal, could be made out winding away to the Great Northwest in a series of elevations of varying height.

The boys lived in one of the most picturesque regions of the United States, and they fully appreciated the scenic advantages that were theirs.

Almost at their feet was the yawning fissure in the range which went by the name of the Devil's Chimney.

It was about two yards in width and perhaps three in length, at the opening, and it was of unknown depth, though commonly rated at two hundred feet, because it had been probed that far with a line and sinker.

There was a sheer drop of thirty feet from the mouth to the first ledge, but beyond that there appeared to be numerous, though precarious, footholds as far down as one could see.

The Chimney was known to contain many little caverns, in which adventurous villagers had at one time or another found old stone weapons and rude utensils of some aboriginal tribe that had lived here in ages gone by.

One of the reasons why Clif and Walter wanted to explore the Chimney was because they hoped to secure some of those curiosities for their private museums.

The boys wasted little time in admiration of the landscape, for they were perfectly familiar with it from every point of view.

"That's a long line you've got there, Clif," said Singleton, as his friend threw the coil on the ground. "How far do you think it will reach?"

"A hundred feet," replied Clif. "That's as far as we shall want to go this afternoon."

Walter agreed with him, and then proceeded to tie one end of the thin but strong rope around the trunk of the solitary dead tree that grew near the brink of the crevasse.

"That will hold all right," said Singleton, after both had pulled on it with all their might. "Now, to prevent it fraying on the rocks at the edge of the Chimney, we'll fold up both our jackets and lay it across them."

This was done and then Clif, taking the lead, swung himself over the edge of the chasm, and slid down to the ledge, ten yards below.

"Come on, old fellow," he sang out to Singleton.

Walter looked down and, seeing that all was clear for him to follow, swung off and was soon standing beside his friend.

Clif kicked the slack of the rope into the depths of the Chimney and was looking for the easiest way to continue to descend when his chum stopped him.

"Let's look all around here first for that red pocketbook," he said.

"All right," answered Clif. "You take the first try and go to the left. Then I'll go to the right when you're done with the rope."

Every part of the narrow ledge, and all the fissures round-about, were carefully inspected for the missing wallet, but they didn't find the least sign of it.

"If you're ready we'll go on down and try to find one of those caverns," said Clif. "I'll lead the way, and don't you crowd me. We'll have to step from crag to crag very carefully. There's a big bunch of bushes twenty feet or so below. We'll have to avoid that as we go down."

"Say, Clif," said Walter, as his chum was about to resume his downward course, "what's this thing sticking in a crevice a couple of yards below us?"

"Whereabouts?" asked Clif.

"There," answered Singleton, pointing with his finger.

"I give it up. I'll have to swing off, slide down and look at it."

He did so, and, hanging in mid-air, he put his hands into the crevice in question and withdrew the missing but badly weather-stained pocketbook.

"Hurrah!" shouted Clif, waving his hand and the wallet at his chum. "I've got it."

"Not the red pocketbook?" palpitated Walter in some excitement.

"Yes, the red pocketbook."

His triumphant exclamation reached other ears than those of his chum on the ledge above.

Howard Fleming had reached the mouth of the Chimney a few minutes after the two boys had gone down.

He saw the rope stretching from the tree and over the pair of carefully folded jackets, into the depths of the chasm, and he knew that his cousin and Walter Singleton had begun the exploration of the crevasse.

Crawling to the edge of the opening, he peered down and saw the boys searching the vicinity of the ledge for the wallet.

He knew that was what they were up to by their conversation.

"It won't be well for either of you if you find it," he gritted between his teeth, while his eyes glared balefully. "I'm not going to have father's scheme spoiled and all my own chances destroyed, not if I can help myself."

He watched Clif and Walter till they gave up the hunt, and then he breathed easier.

"They can't find it. Good! I didn't think they would, for father has searched every inch down there more than once. Now they're going further down. If Clif only would lose his hold, fall and break his neck he would be doing a good thing for me. I don't expect any such luck, however. They'll look out for themselves, and as long as they hold onto this rope they're safe enough, I'll be bound."

At that moment he heard Singleton call Clif's attention to the object sticking in the crevice below.

Howard's face turned a chalky white and his breath came thick and fast.

Had they discovered the location of the wallet at last?

His bulging eyes followed Clif's descent and he saw him reach for the object in question. Then he heard his cousin's gleeful cry, and knew instinctively that Clif had hold of the lost pocketbook.

Almost beside himself with rage, Howard glared down and saw Clif swinging in the air with something in his hand.

"Yes, the red pocketbook," came up his cousin's words as plainly as anything he had ever heard.

"He's got it! He's got it! We'll be ruined when he opens it and finds out what's inside," hissed the young rascal, shivering as with the ague. "Oh, if the rope would only break. If it only would—"

He stopped suddenly as a terrible thought flashed through his brain.

Why shouldn't it break if he wanted it to?"

He had a sharp penknife in his pocket.

It would be an easy matter to sever a couple of strands, the rest would unravel under his cousin's weight, and then—

And then, nothing could save Clif.

Without dwelling upon the fiendishness of his contemplated crime, Howard tore the knife from his pocket, opened it and hastily began to saw the rope.

He looked around stealthily in a sort of guilty panic lest some one might come unobserved upon the scene and detect him at his terrible work.

He might have saved himself that trouble, for there was no one other than himself and the two boys below within a mile of that airy spot.

As he worked away with his knife he glanced down again, for he felt the rope shiver.

"He's coming up hand-over-hand," he muttered. "He'll soon be safe, and the truth will come out. I must hurry."

He bore heavily on the blade of the knife.

It had already penetrated one strand and was half through another.

Now it went through the second.

It is doubtful if his evil work was not already accomplished, for it looked as if the line was straining at the severed section to the breaking point.

So desperately in earnest was he that he couldn't stop and trust to chance.

He made another vicious cut with the blade.

With a sharp snap the rope suddenly parted.

A terrible, despairing cry came up from the depths, followed by the sound of a body striking against some spot below and bounding off again.

This was followed by a soft thud and a heavy rustling, and then all was quiet save for Singleton's horrified exclamation:

"My heavens! The rope has parted and he has gone to his death!"

CHAPTER III.

IN THE DEVIL'S CHIMNEY.

His terrible purpose accomplished, Howard Fleming lay upon the ground shivering from fright and excitement.

His rage against his cousin seemed to melt away and he began to repent of his deed.

"I wish I hadn't done it," he whispered to himself. "I wish I hadn't done it. I can't get that awful cry out of my head, and that thud of his body against the rocks. It will haunt me, I know it will. What a fool I was!"

He didn't dare to look down lest he should see the lifeless form of his cousin on some ledge a hundred feet below.

He could hear Walter Singleton bewailing the loss of his chum in grief-stricken tones, and blaming himself for suggesting the adventure for the afternoon.

At length Howard raised himself on his knees.

His knife dropped from his nerveless fingers and slipped under the jackets.

He never thought to look for it—in fact its presence seemed to have escaped from his seething memory.

And yet even at that fateful moment a certain spark of cunning asserted itself.

As he looked at the severed end of the rope, and saw the clean-cut edge, it occurred to him that the condition of the rope was incompatible with the presence of the jackets on the edge of the hole, and he drew the jackets back, thus burying the handle of his knife out of sight, so that it might appear that the rope had been severed by friction against the rock.

It was a crafty move, but in working it out he only dug a pitfall for himself that was to bring the guilt of the transaction home to his guilty soul.

His open knife, with particles of the hairs of the rope sticking to it, and with his initials engraved on the handle, lay unthought of under the clothes.

Trembling and unmanned, he rose to his feet, and with a shuddering glance at the mouth of the Chimney, he reeled from the spot.

In the meantime, Singleton, after bemoaning the loss of his chum, and peering down into the crevasse for some sight of his body in vain, began to consider how he was to get out of the Chimney and return to Beeching Hollow to tell the bad news.

The rope having been severed at the brink of the opening, he was completely cut off by a wall of rock thirty feet high.

There was no way of scaling it from any point.

It was far easier to go down into the depths, dangerous as that feat was, without anything by which he could steady himself.

But of what use would that be?

He would only be putting himself deeper in the mire.

Even if he could go clear to the bottom, two hundred or more feet below, he could not tell if there was any way out to any other part of the range.

What, then, was to be his fate?

Was he doomed to perish of starvation in that spot?

It was extremely uncertain when anybody would come to the mouth of the Chimney.

Unfortunately, they had not told any of the servants whether they were bound, and when they were missed their whereabouts would only be a matter of conjecture.

They had been repeatedly warned by Mr. Fleming to stay away from the Chimney, therefore it was scarcely likely, except as the last resort, that the place would be visited by those sent in search of them.

The Witches' Ravine would undoubtedly be visited first, and then other glens in the range.

When the search party did come to the Chimney, Walter asked himself if he would still be on the narrow ledge.

Thus an hour passed slowly away, the sun declined in the West, and still Singleton stood moodily watching the creeping shadows gathering around the upper part of the Chimney.

Suddenly he heard a sound from below.

It went through him like an electric shock.

He could have sworn that it was the voice of his chum whom he had given up for dead.

"Hilloa! Are you there, Walter?"

"Great Scott!" cried Singleton. "it's Clif! That's his voice. Can it be that his spirit is calling to me from the depths to come and meet him?"

"Hilloa! Hilloa! Walter!"

It was a very life-like hail—not at all like a ghost.

"My gracious! That is surely Clif's voice. Can he have escaped after all?"

He sank to his knees and peered down into the depths of the Chimney.

"Hello, yourself!" he shouted. "Are you there, Clif?" From a spot but twenty feet below came back the answer. "Yes. I'm down here in the bushes."

Walter looked in that direction and saw his chum's face, streaked with blood, sticking right out of the mass of bushes that projected from the inner side of the crevasse.

"Are you badly hurt?" asked Walter, in a tone of much concern.

"No, I don't think so," replied Clif.

"That's good," said Singleton, thankfully.

"Can you come down here?" asked Clif.

"I'll manage to do it somehow," returned his friend.

Slowly and with great caution he made his way down to the edge of the bushes.

"Shake, Clif," he said, earnestly. "I never was so happy in my life before as I am to know that you're alive after that fearful fall you had."

"I've been wondering just why I am alive myself," replied Clif, with a faint smile. "These bushes broke my fall, and pitched me into a kind of cavern behind."

"Is there a cavern there?" asked Walter, in some astonishment.

"Yes."

"How are we to get out of this place?" inquired Walter with a rueful look.

"You mean out of the Chimney?"

"Yes."

"Well, we can't very well go up, so I suppose we must go down instead, and try to find our way out. I've got hold of about eighty feet of the line, from the point where it broke."

"It's curious how it came to snap off. It seemed strong enough when we both tested it. Do you suppose it snapped close to the tree?"

"No, I don't. It would have been frayed at the end if it had. It looks just as if it had been cut through by a sharp knife. Look," and Clif held it out to him.

There was light enough down there for Singleton to examine the severed end of the rope.

"It does look as if it had been cut by a knife. Our jackets must have slipped somehow and a sharp rock probably did the damage. It parted on the edge of the opening."

"How do you know?" asked Clif.

"By this paint stain which I noticed when I placed our jackets under the rope."

"Then it must have been the rock that did it."

"That's the only way I can account for it. But it is a remarkably clean cut. I don't see how a rock could do this without fraying the edges."

"Well, no use wasting our time in useless surmises. I nearly got my quietus, and very thankful I am that I escaped a terrible death."

"Well, I'm dead glad you got off so easily, Clif. I never suffered so much in all my life as I did during the last hour. By the way, how about the pocketbook? I suppose you dropped it down the Chimney."

"No, I didn't. When I came to my senses a little while ago I found it in my hand. I had a kind of death-grip on it. It's in my pocket."

"Mr. Fleming ought to be very grateful to you for recovering it for him."

"I suppose he will; but he'll give me a lecture, I dare say, for risking my life up here against his express commands."

"We are whistling before we are out of the woods. We may not be able to get out of the Devil's Chimney at all, especially if we go down to the bottom. No one knows where the end of this crevasse leads to. It may go right on into the interior of the range, or it may stop a hundred feet or so below. I think it would be better to stay up here, and trust to our being found by those who are bound to go in search of us."

"I don't know but you are right, Walt. It is rather a risky venture to go on downward without having the least idea where we are likely to fetch up at. Well, step into these bushes. We'll take a look around this cavern behind me and see what's to be seen. We might as well do that as anything else."

Singleton agreed with his chum, and stepping into the bushes sank up to his armpits in the yielding mass.

"Now, follow me," said Clif, sinking out of sight.

Walter did so, and found himself in a hole that was as dark as the fabled caves of Erebus.

CHAPTER IV.

THE WAY OUT.

As they expected to explore some of the caverns that opened off of the Chimney crevasse the boys had come prepared for that purpose.

Each had a small collapsible dark-lantern, that could easily be carried in their pockets.

These they produced and lighted, and with the slide drawn back, throwing a two-inch bull's-eye circle of light, they started forward to investigate the subterranean hole in the mountain range.

It extended about one hundred feet straight ahead, and from its general aspect it looked to the boys as if human hands had assisted nature's work by enlarging it to its present size.

There was nothing in the shape of aboriginal curiosities to be found.

Previous visitors had cleaned out whatever in that line might have been there once.

At the extreme end was a pile of debris, where a portion of the roof had caved in.

"I guess we can't go any further," said Clif, flashing his lantern over the pile of earth and stone.

"No; we're blocked," replied Singleton. "I don't believe there was any more of it, anyway. The rear of the cavern has simply fallen in."

"It seems to be the general idea in this neighborhood that a tribe of ancient Indians lived in these caves," said Clif.

"I guess they did. This cave shows plenty of evidences of having been enlarged by rude tools."

"They must have been a tribe of what are known as cliff dwellers."

"That's right. Those Indians lived in holes, hollowed out of cliffs and high bluffs."

"I wonder how they got in and out? They must have been as sure-footed as mountain goats."

"Perhaps they used ladders made out of strong vines, plaited together."

"Maybe they did. They must have had something of that sort to get up and down that thirty-foot wall of rock above the ledge that we struck first."

"That's reasonable, for no human being could crawl up that place unless he had a pair of wings."

"I'll bet he couldn't. Now if they had tools with which they could enlarge this cavern, why couldn't they have cut a back entrance from here to the top of the mountain? It's only fifty feet at the outside."

"They probably could have done so if they had wanted to real bad. But I've always heard that the average redman was a lazy fellow, except when on the chase or the war-path. The women did all the manual labor."

"Well, if the women enlarged this cave they might have bored a way out upward, which would have greatly simplified entrance and exit."

"I suppose they didn't want to do any more of that kind of work than they could help," said Singleton. "What seems to us a reasonable way of doing things might have been regarded as quite superfluous by the cliff dwellers. They were accustomed to crawling down the face of the rock on the outside, and what they were used to, naturally had the call with them."

"There doesn't appear to be anything left in the way of native curiosities," remarked Clif. "We'll have to go to some of the lower caves to find something of that kind."

"I guess we will," replied Walter; "but I'm not as interested in them as I was before our way to get back to the surface above was cut off."

"I can't say that I am, either. I'd like to be sure of getting back to the top of the mountain. I wish I knew some way of getting there."

"I'm afraid our chances at present are rather slim," replied Walter. "It will be dark soon, and that will mean that we'll have to stay here all night, if not longer. I wouldn't kick about going without my supper, though I am beginning to feel quite hungry, if I had good reason for believing that we would be able to get out in the morning."

"It isn't impossible that a searching party may be up this way after dark. At any rate we'll be on the lookout for anything in that line. In the meanwhile let us dig this rubbish over to see if we can find any curiosities under it. It will be a good way to kill time."

Singleton agreed, though without much enthusiasm, and the two boys began to pull the heap of debris to pieces.

And while they worked they talked about the chances of a rescue from their peculiar situation.

"I don't believe there's any use monkeying with this pile of stuff any more," said Singleton at length. "There don't seem to be anything here but stones and dirt."

As he uttered the words Clif, in reaching for a good-sized stone, lost his balance and his arm shot clean through the hill of debris.

"There must be a hole there," he said, as he recovered his feet. "Help me to clear the way to it."

Singleton took hold again and the boys soon uncovered a dark, tunnel-like excavation, running upward.

"You wait here, Walt, and I'll crawl up and see where it goes to," said Clif, as he got down on his hands and knees and disappeared into the hole.

Flashing his bull's-eye lantern about, he crawled ahead up a gentle declivity that seemed too natural to have been fashioned by the hand of man.

"Looks to me as if an underground mountain stream ran through here once upon a time," he said to himself.

He found places, however, that showed the impress of rude tools, as if its width had been increased to correspond with the rest of the tunnel.

"I really believe this passage was used by the Indians as a back entrance to the cave. If so, I may be able to find the outlet somewhere near the top of the mountain," said Clif, as he pushed expectantly forward.

The passage took a sudden turn to the left after he had penetrated a matter of sixty feet, and a moment later he found the end blocked up.

As his heart sank with a thrill of disappointment he discovered that it was merely a mass of bushes that lay before him.

The obstruction was so thick, however, that it cut off all the rays of light from the outside.

Clif took out his stout jackknife and hacked away at the stuff until, after forcing his way through the first barrier, he began to see light shimmering through the underbrush.

At last the hole ended abruptly and he found himself in a dense thicket.

Rising to his feet, he found, with a sense of great thankfulness, that he was actually in the outer air, somewhere at the top of the mountain.

His first impulse was to continue his progress to complete freedom, but the thought occurred to him that in such a complex mass of dried vegetation he might lose track of the mouth of the underground passage, and thus be unable to return to his companion with the good news.

He was sorry now that he had not suggested to Walter to follow him instead of remaining behind in the cave.

There was nothing for him but to return and lead Walter up to the egress.

So he pushed his way back into the passage, and hurriedly retraced his steps.

He found Walter impatiently awaiting his return.

"Where have you been so long?" asked his chum. "I was just about to come after you and see whether some new misfortune had happened to you."

"I wish you had followed me, for nothing but good luck attended me."

"Good luck, eh! What do you mean by that?" asked Singleton, curiously.

"I mean that this passage leads right to the top of the mountain."

"It does? Hurrah for that! Let's lose no time getting out, then."

"Come on."

Clif started off leading the way, and ere long came to the bushy obstruction.

They pushed through it into the thicket, and thence forced their way to the clearing beyond.

"Glory hallelujah!" cried Walter. "How good the air feels!"

It was just sundown, and they calculated that it would be dusk by the time they reached the valley once more.

"Let's get our jackets and go," said Clif. "Yonder is the mouth of the Chimney."

They made their way there, and saw the end of the severed line lying upon their clothes.

"I don't see how our jackets could have slipped back so far from where I placed them," said Walter, looking down at the folded pile in some perplexity.

"Nor I," answered Clif, looking down and picking his jacket up.

Singleton followed suit and then both boys saw Howard Fleming's open knife.

Walter picked it.

"That doesn't belong to me," he said.

"It isn't mine," said Clif. "It looks like my cousin's."

"Your cousin's!" exclaimed Walter in some surprise. "What is it doing here?"

"Ask me something easier," replied Clif.

"It is your cousin's," said Walter. "Here are his initials on the plate. Say, look at those fibers on the blade," he added suddenly.

Clif looked at them, and then the boys glanced at each other.

The same disquieting thought had struck both on the instant.

Singleton stooped down, snatched up the end of the rope and examined it.

"I hate almost to say what I think; but it seems to have been cut by something sharper than a rock."

He got down on his hands and knees and carefully looked the edge of the rock over.

There wasn't a single fiber of rope clinging to it.

"There isn't a sign of the rope having been frayed by the rock," he said with solemn earnestness. "What do you think about it, Clif?"

"I'd rather not say," replied Clif, with a chill of horrible suspicion at his heart.

"You don't think that your cousin followed us up here and deliberately cut this rope at the moment you were hanging to it, do you?"

"No, I can't believe that he would be guilty of such a crime," said Clif, with a shudder.

"Well, perhaps not; but I never liked nor trusted Howard Fleming, and there is not a particle of doubt but your death would be of great advantage to him."

"How?"

"Why, his father would succeed to the Beeching Hollow property, and in due time Howard himself might expect to become its owner."

"I never thought of that," replied Clif, in a hushed tone.

CHAPTER V.

FATHER AND SON.

Slowly and almost silently the two boys walked down the mountainside to the valley below.

Neither was in the humor for conversation.

Clif never had such food for thought in his life before, while Walter was quite as busy figuring up the situation.

It was almost dark by the time they reached a side gate on the Beeching Hollow property.

"Well, old man, I'll see you to-morrow," said Singleton, with very little of his customary cheerfulness.

"Come over early, Walt. I may want to have a serious talk with you," replied Clif.

"I'll be over at nine," was the reply, and then the chums parted.

As Clif was passing close to one of the partly open windows of the sitting-room he heard his name mentioned in the room by the voice of Howard Fleming.

Curious to learn if he was the subject of the conversation going on inside between his cousin and Mr. Fleming, Clif stopped and listened.

After what had happened at the Devil's Chimney, the boy was anxious to find out whether or not Howard Fleming had really cut the rope for the purpose of sending him to a sudden death.

"What's that you say?" he heard Mr. Fleming exclaim in an agitated tone. "Clifford Price has fallen down the Devil's Chimney?"

"Yes, father," replied Howard, tremulously. "He did."

"How do you know?" demanded Clif's guardian, pausing before his son, and gazing sharply into his face.

"I saw him."

"You saw him fall!" cried Mr. Fleming, who had only just returned from the village. "You actually saw him fall?"

"I did."

The gentleman received the information with some doubt.

"How came both you and Clifford at the Devil's Chimney? I have repeatedly warned him to keep away from that spot, and he is not a boy that usually disobeys my commands."

"Walter Singleton induced him to go there to hunt for your lost pocketbook."

"Ha! Indeed!"

"As soon as I found what they were going to do I looked for you to let you know about their intentions. When I learned that you had gone to the village I determined to follow them to the Chimney to see what luck they would have."

"You did right. So Singleton accompanied him, eh?"

"Sure he did. They go everywhere together."

"Well?"

"Clif got that long rope out of the barn that you used for the same purpose."

"He did?"

"Yes. They tied one end of it around the dead tree and then slid down to the ledge, where they hunted for a while without finding the pocketbook."

"I am not surprised, for I now believe the wallet went all the way to the bottom."

"That's where you're wrong."

"Eh?" in surprise.

"It didn't go to the bottom, but was caught in a hole half a dozen feet below the ledge."

"How do you know that?" asked Mr. Fleming in a startled voice.

"Because that's where Clif found it."

"Clifford found my pocketbook a few feet below the ledge?" exclaimed Mr. Fleming incredulously. "Why, I have examined the Chimney walls to the depth of at least sixty feet and saw no sign of it."

"You must be near-sighted, then, for Clif discovered it right away."

"Are you telling the truth, Howard?" asked his father in an agitated tone.

"I am, for I saw him find it."

"Where were you at the time?"

"Flat on the ground at the mouth of the Chimney, looking down."

"Did the others know you were there?"

"They did not," replied Howard, with a look of satisfaction. "I took good care that they didn't."

"Go on."

"Clif was hanging to the rope when I saw him pick the wallet out of the crevice and hold it up to Walter in a triumphant way. I knew then that something would happen as soon as he opened that pocketbook and looked into it. He would find a paper which in his possession would queer all your plans to get possession of the fortune that rightfully belongs to him. As your loss would be mine as well, I was mad with rage. I wished that something might happen to him then and there. I wished the rope would break—"

"Yes, yes," said Mr. Fleming feverishly.

"Well, the rope did break."

"What!" gasped Clif's guardian.

"And Clif and the pocketbook disappeared down the crevasse like a shot."

"My heavens!" ejaculated Mr. Fleming, the perspiration breaking out on his forehead. "Then he is dead."

"He is dead all right," answered Howard, catching his breath, "and we are—safe."

"How came the rope to break?" asked Mr. Fleming, looking hard at his son. "It was an unusually stout line which I procured with especial reference to strength, because I intended and did trust my own life to its tenacity in the Chimney."

"Clif's movements while hanging to it probably caused the rock to cut into it until his weight snapped it in two."

"But you were there. Didn't you notice that the rope was becoming frayed? You ought to have warned Clif."

"Ought I? If he had escaped the secret of the pocketbook would have come to light, wouldn't it?"

"I didn't think of that," breathed Mr. Fleming, wiping his face with his handkerchief.

"Well, I did. I considered it my duty to you to see that Clif did not learn the truth. We should have been ruined."

There was silence in the room for a moment or two, and the boy outside under the window listened eagerly for the conversation to be renewed.

"Howard," said Mr. Fleming in a changed tone, that trembled in spite of his efforts to steady it, "did that rope break of itself, or did you—"

"Did I what?" replied Clif's cousin, in a choked voice.

"Did you make it break?"

"How could I make it break?" the boy asked doggedly.

"You might have worked it back and forth against the sharp edge of the rock."

"With him hanging to it?"

"Or you might have—"

"Might have what?"

"Cut it."

"Do you take me for a fool, father?" replied Howard, almost sneeringly.

"No. Your words and actions prove otherwise. I take you for a smarter boy than I thought. You say you wished the rope to break at that particular moment. Well, what is the inference? You needn't answer me. I have my own opinion. Since Clifford has gone to his death we will not discuss the means by which he met his fate. We will, of course, look upon it as a most lamentable accident which cut short the career of a promising boy in its bud. Much as I deplore his loss, I cannot but feel that it was for the best."

"Sure it was—for us," replied Howard, flippantly.

"Death often comes like a thief in the night to rob us of our most cherished friends," continued Mr. Fleming, without noticing his son's ill-advised remark. "We are here today, and to-morrow we are gone to that bourne whence no traveler returns. It is very sad to think that a noble boy—"

"Oh, drop it, father," said Howard, impatiently. "What's the use of trying to pull the wool over my eyes? I know you like a book. I've helped you to get rid of an obstacle in your path. Instead of talking nonsense you ought to be thanking me for my efforts in your behalf. The only unfortunate part about the matter is that the pocketbook went down with him. We shall never be able to recover it now. The paper which is of so much importance in locating a fortune is lost for good now, and all we shall have is this property, which isn't so very valuable when compared with what it was expected that Clif might inherit."

Mr. Fleming made no attempt to reprove his son for his disrespectful language, but walked up and down the floor several times without speaking.

At that moment the hall doorbell rang in the kitchen entry, and a few minutes afterward the servant announced a visitor to see Mr. Fleming.

"Who is it, Jane?" asked the acting master of the house.

"He said his name was Elliot Monkton, sir."

"Who?" gasped Mr. Fleming, turning almost white to the lips.

"Elliot Monkton, sir."

"What's the matter, father?" asked Howard, observing the strange effect the name had on his parent.

"Nothing," replied Mr. Fleming, hoarsely. "Show the gentleman in, Jane. Howard, I shall have to ask you to retire. I have private business with this man."

CHAPTER VI.

MR. FLEMING'S VISITOR.

Howard, in obedience to his father's command, left the room.

Nevertheless he was determined to overhear the interview if he could do so, for his curiosity was raised to the highest pitch.

The partly open window suggested the means of accomplishing his object.

He ran out of the side door and hastened to the desirable spot.

Clif heard his approaching footsteps when it was too late to make his retreat unobserved, and he crouched down in the bushes, hoping that Howard would pass on.

Instead of which his cousin came directly toward him.

There was no way to avoid the meeting, so Clif rose up suddenly right in front of him, hoping that the surprise would enable him to get out of the dilemma.

The effect produced was more than Clif had calculated on.

The moment Howard's gaze rested on the dimly seen features of the boy he believed he had murdered he staggered back with a low cry like that of a hunted animal.

Then he threw his arms wildly into the air and fell forward on his face in a swoon.

Clif bent over him and saw that he was quite insensible.

"The shock of seeing me was too much for him," said the heir of Beeching Hollow. "A guilty conscience is its own accuser."

Clif raised him in his arms and carried him around to the side porch and propped him up against the trellis-work.

"The evening air will revive him in a little while," he said. "I dare say he took me for my ghost. I'm afraid the little rascal won't get half what is coming to him. To think that he would deliberately try to murder me so that his father, and eventually himself, might succeed to my property! I never suspected that my guardian had designs against me before. Will my life be safe in Beeching Hollow after this? I'll have to talk the matter over with Walt. I'm in a mighty serious predicament. It's not such a fine thing to be heir to property when other people covet it. I want nearly three years yet of my majority. A whole lot of schemes can be worked against me in that time. However, forewarned is forearmed, they say. I shall be well on my guard after this."

Clif returned to his former post under the window because he instinctively believed that he would hear something more about himself.

The visitor had been introduced into the sitting-room and had taken the chair near the window lately vacated by Howard Fleming.

"Well, Mr. Fleming," he remarked with a short laugh, "aren't you glad to see an old friend like me?"

"What brought you here, Elliot Monkton?" was Mr. Fleming's reply.

"A lack of ready money. There you have it—short and to the point."

"What have I got to do with your financial condition?" asked Clif's guardian a bit uneasily.

"A great deal when it happens that I look upon you as my banker," replied Monkton, coolly.

"Your banker!" ejaculated Mr. Fleming.

"Precisely. My banker."

"I owe you nothing, sir."

"Don't you?" with a sarcastic laugh. "What a shockingly bad memory you have, Edward Fleming. Now, on the contrary, I have a good memory. For instance, I recollect with remarkable clearness a little job I did for you in the expert penmanship line—a bogus will—"

"Hush! Would you ruin me, Elliot Monkton?" cried Mr. Fleming.

"Not at all. It's the last idea in my mind to injure the goose that is able to lay an occasional golden egg for my benefit."

"I see your object. You propose to blackmail me," said Mr. Fleming, bitterly.

"Blackmail you! That's an ugly word. Suppose we boycott it. I merely called upon you to solicit a loan as I am hard pressed for means to meet life as a gentleman should."

"Do you call yourself—"

"A gentleman?" interrupted Monkton. "Sure. Why not? By the way, my throat is dry. It was a warm afternoon. Why don't you offer me a glass of something and a biscuit? A good cigar would also be gratefully appreciated by yours truly."

Mr. Fleming pushed an electric button in the wall.

A trim maid presently made her appearance in answer to the signal.

"Go to the liquor safe," he said, handing her his bunch of keys, "and fetch a decanter of whisky. Bring two glasses and a plate of biscuits."

The maid bobbed and left the room.

"Here is a cigar," he added, taking one from his vest pocket and offering it to his visitor.

"Thanks," said Monkton, accepting it, biting off the end, and then striking a match on the sole of his shoe.

He was soon puffing the weed with great satisfaction.

Nothing more was said until the maid brought the whisky and crackers.

"Help yourself," said Mr. Fleming, shortly.

"Thanks! I will. I never was bashful about helping myself to anything within my reach."

"I believe you," replied Mr. Fleming, dryly.

At that moment a bell rang in the corridor outside the dining-room.

"I suppose that means dinner," said Monkton. "I won't detain you. I can wait here till you are through. I've had mine."

"No," replied Mr. Fleming, "I'd prefer to finish this interview at once."

"Just as you please," replied his visitor, nonchalantly.

"What do you want?"

"I told you—money."

"I was under the impression I had paid you well for executing that will and attending to such other matters as the death of Grantley Price made necessary," said Mr. Fleming, coolly.

"I won't deny it. You did the right thing then. But you see when a man is strapped charity begins at home. It is human nature to press an advantage when you have it at your beck and call. I aided and abetted you to commit a felony. We are both in the same boat. My end of the boat looks shaky, so I look to you to see me through."

"And suppose I refuse? What then?"

"What then? Why, you wouldn't be so foolish as to refuse."

"No? You have no real hold on me. Your word alone against mine would amount to nothing in court or out of it."

"That's right," replied Monkton cheerfully. "I knew that from the first, so I provided against it."

"How, may I ask?" said Mr. Fleming, sneeringly.

"What became of the real, genuine, Simon-pure will drawn by Grantley Price, leaving everything of which he died possessed to his son, Clifford Price, with a life interest only to his wife, who, I understand, has since died?"

"Why, it was destroyed, of course."

"It was—I don't think," laughed Monkton.

"What do you mean? I saw it destroyed with my own eyes. Do you think I was a fool to take any chances with it?"

"Well, now, I had an idea that that will was in my possession."

"In your possession!"

"Pre-cisely. In my possession."

"You must be crazy."

"Not that I am aware of," returned Monkton, blowing a cloud of smoke from his lips, and then flicking a bit of ashes from his trousers.

"Look here, Monkton, I can't see what you're getting at. You were in the room and saw me apply a match to the original will. Together we watched it burn until it was reduced to a charred mass. You know that as well as I do."

Elliot Monkton laughed.

"I believe I had the real will in my possession for a whole night for the purpose of imitating Mr. Price's signature on the bogus will."

"You did. What of it?"

"This much. As I always keep an eye to the windward—meaning that I never lose sight of my own interest in any transaction I engage in—I took the precaution to make an exact copy of the original will, and sign it with a facsimile reproduction of Grantley Price's name. This I afterward returned to you in place of the original, and you destroyed it exactly as you say you did. I kept the real will, thinking that you might recognize its value when I got hard up. Well, I'm hard up now. I have called to get a loan on the strength of the original will. There, you have the whole matter in a nutshell," said Monkton, complacently.

"You scoundrel!" hissed Mr. Fleming, livid with anger and fear.

"Thanks! Hard words break no bones. At the same time I think the word fits you even better than it does me. A man who will endeavor to thwart the last wishes of a dead man, to the ultimate injury of that man's heir, merits a pretty hard name, don't you think?"

"After all, this story of yours seems preposterous," said Mr. Fleming, after a moment's thought. "You will have to produce the will to convince me that you have spoken the truth."

"I can do that."

"When?"

"Now."

The one little word gave Mr. Fleming a cold sweat.

CHAPTER VII.

MONKTON MAKES A PROPOSITION.

Mr. Fleming took a turn up and down the room. Finally he paused in front of his visitor.

"Let me see it," he said, sharply.

"All right," replied Monkton. "I'd prefer, though, if you'd go on the other side of that table. Just out of reach, you know. I'll hold the document so that the light from the lamp will shine full upon it."

"So you won't trust me?" gritted Mr. Fleming.

"Well, I always like to be on the safe side, especially in so important a matter as this. You might have a fit, or something of that sort, when you see it, and people do strange things under such circumstances."

Mr. Fleming glared at his visitor and then went to the other side of the table.

"Thanks," said Monkton.

He put his hand in an inner pocket and drew out a legal-looking paper.

He opened it and held it up to the light.

"Are you satisfied?" he asked, quickly returning it to his pocket.

"I am—that you are a soulless rascal. I treated you squarely, now you turn on me."

"I haven't done a thing but ask you for some money."

"How much do you want, once and for all, for that paper?"

"That document is not for sale—at least not yet," replied Monkton, throwing the butt of his cigar into the cuspidor.

"Your purpose, then, is to subject me to a steady drain at such intervals as suit your purpose."

"My purpose at present is to raise a loan on this paper of one thousand dollars—the security, however, will remain in my hands."

"You talk as if I was made of money," said Mr. Fleming, angrily. "I am not the owner of Beeching Hollow, nor have I any right to touch a cent of the funds in bank except for the good of the young heir."

Monkton pulled on his mustache reflectively.

"It's two years since I drew that bogus will for you. It's about time, isn't it, that you made some use of it?"

"I've made all the use of it I could. I filed it as Grantley Price's last will and testament in favor of his widow."

"I don't mean that. Of course, you had to do that. But as I suppose you prevented the widow from making any paper devising this property to her son, or destroyed such a document if she did make it, it's about time you started to dispossess the heir by bringing forward evidence to show that he was not the real son of Mr. and Mrs. Price, but adopted by them in his infancy. You remember you told me that was your little game."

"I did not intend to do that until he was twenty-one."

"Why not?"

"I had my reasons. However, it doesn't matter. The necessity has ceased to exist."

"Has it? How is that?"

Mr. Fleming bit his lips, for he saw he had made a rash admission.

"Oh, it's nothing," he hastily replied.

Monkton looked at him with a peculiar expression.

"After all, this property is a mere bagatelle compared with the turquoise mine discovered by Grantley Price on his Arizona ranch, the title to which you have probably long since recorded in your own name," he said, with a cunning look.

"Unfortunately, I have not yet recorded it," replied Mr. Fleming.

"Oh, come, now, you can't expect me to swallow that," answered Monkton, jeeringly. "I prepared a forged deed of that ranch for you. All you had to do was to go to Tucson and have it recorded. The property and the mine became yours. You are not a man to dilly-dally with such a fortune as that."

"I might have done it, it is true, but I deemed it prudent to wait until my half-sister, the widow, died. I judged she could not long survive her husband."

"Even so," said Monkton, cheerfully. "Mrs. Price has been dead a year. You have had lots of time to do the business."

"I admit it, and intended to file it within a month after her funeral."

"Well, didn't you?"

"No."

"Why not?" asked Monkton, with a mixture of astonishment and incredulity in his tone.

"Because I lost the deed."

"You lost that deed?"

"I did, together with the paper describing the location of the mine."

"What are you giving me, Fleming? Do you think I'm a softy?"

"I'm telling you the truth. I had them in a red pocketbook that I always carried about with me. One day I was up on the mountain yonder with a party of friends showing them a deep crevasse called the Devil's Chimney. I took out my pocketbook to get a card, when one of the ladies jostled my arm and the wallet dropped into the yawning hole. That was a year ago. Since then I have made several ineffectual attempts to find it. Now you know why I did not file the paper."

"How deep is the hole?"

"It is known to be about 200 feet."

"Isn't there any way of reaching the bottom?"

"I guess it could be reached with the help of a rope long enough."

"It would pay you to get such a rope and send an expert climber down on the chance of finding your wallet. That turquoise mine is worth a million if it is worth a cent, judging from what Price told me about it before he died."

"I have no doubt that it is very valuable; but without those two missing documents it is lost to me. The forged conveyance I could, I suppose, replace with your assistance, for you prepared the other. Still, it would be of little use unless I had the paper describing the mine's location."

"It looks to me as if I'll have to take a hand in its recovery," said Monkton. "I'm a pretty clever hand at mountain climbing. We'll get a 200-foot rope, and I'll go down into that hole and search for your pocketbook, provided, of course, that you guarantee me a suitable reward."

"What do you call a suitable reward?"

"A quarter interest in the mine."

"You don't ask much."

"Isn't it worth that for me to find your pocketbook? Besides, you shall have this original will. I'll throw that into the bargain."

"I'll consider your proposition. Come here to-morrow morning and you shall have my answer."

"All right, Fleming, I'll be on hand. In the meanwhile, I'll touch you for a hundred, as a sort of guarantee of good faith. When I restore you your pocketbook I shall want $500 more. Then we'll go to Tucson together. You can record your conveyance and make out another to me for a quarter interest. When it is in my hand the will is yours, and I will never worry you any more. I think I've made you a very fair offer."

"You shall have the hundred dollars, and we'll probably come to an agreement to-morrow. I will get the money for you in a few minutes."

Mr. Fleming left the room, and in five minutes returned with the bills, which he handed to his former confederate in crime.

"Thanks. You'll see me in the morning."

Monkton rose and Mr. Fleming saw him to the front door, after which he went to his belated dinner.

CHAPTER VIII.

WHAT CLIF FINDS IN THE RED POCKETBOOK.

Although it was now eight o'clock in the evening, and Clif hadn't had anything to eat since he ate a light luncheon at one, the boy did not feel hungry.

The discovery of his guardian's duplicity, and the knowledge that his cousin had deliberately tried to murder him that afternoon, depressed him to such an extent as to rob him of his usually healthy appetite.

As soon as he saw that the interview between Mr. Fleming and his visitor was over, he entered the house by a side door, hoping to escape observation, and went up to his room.

Here he busied himself removing the traces of dried blood and dirt from his hands and face, and applying a few pieces of court-plaster over the deeper cuts.

Then he took from his pocket the faded and weather-stained red wallet which his guardian had dropped down the Chimney crevasse.

As a matter of precaution, and to avoid interruption, he locked the door of his chamber before proceeding to examine the pocketbook whose contents was of such importance to Mr. Fleming.

"Howard made the mistake of his life by trying to kill me because I found this wallet. Had he not interfered I should have returned this wallet to his father just as it was. It isn't my nature to pry into other people's property. But I suppose Howard judged me by himself. He felt sure that I would look into it out of mere curiosity, and that I then would discover the secret he and his father have been hiding from me. After what I have heard about the contents of this pocketbook I feel quite justified in looking into it."

He immediately opened the wallet.

From one of the compartments he drew out two legal documents tied together with a rubber band.

The first Clif opened proved to be a deed, duly recorded in the clerk's office at Tucson, Arizona, of a certain 200-acre ranch, fully described as per surveyor's map on file in said county clerk's office, located in the foothills of a detached portion of the Sierra de la Santa Catarina mountain range, in Pinal County, and purchased by Grantley Price from Philip Aroyaz, two years since, for the sum of $2,000, the receipt of which was duly acknowledged.

The second document was a deed of the above-mentioned property, unrecorded, by which Grantley Price transferred all his right and title therein for the sum of one dollar, to Edward Fleming.

From what the boy had overheard of the conversation between Mr. Fleming and Elliot Monkton, Clif knew that his father's signature on this paper was forged.

"Mr. Monkton is a clever penman, I must say," he muttered, "for if I hadn't learned to the contrary I would be willing to swear that that really was my father's signature."

He read the original deed over carefully, but found not the slightest clew to the existence of a turquoise mine in it.

"I remember that father wrote mother that he had purchased this ranch, but he did not say anything then about having discovered a turquoise mine, either on the property or elsewhere. Mr. Fleming told mother that father sold the ranch at a small profit just before he was taken down with the illness which ended in his death, and, of course, mother took his word for it. It is clear that Mr. Fleming intended to cheat us out of this property, just as he contemplates to swindle me out of Beeching Hollow, if he can. After what I have learned I guess he will find his work cut out for him. Let me see what else there is of value to me in this wallet. Mr. Fleming said that it contained a paper showing the exact location of the turquoise mine. I am anxious to find it."

The next compartment he examined was full of memoranda of no interest to Clif, and he returned them to their receptacle.

The last compartment in the pocketbook was covered with a flap that fitted no nicely as to almost escape detection.

In fact, Clif would have overlooked it but that he subjected the long wallet to the closest kind of inspection in order to try and find the paper descriptive of the turquoise mine.

Raising the flap, he saw several papers inside the secret compartment.

The first he pulled out was the very paper he was in search of.

It was a rough diagram of the ranch, with a heavy cross at a certain spot, toward which arrowheads, with attached figures in red ink, pointed.

Several explanatory footnotes at the bottom of the drawing made the diagram easy of comprehension.

Clif soon made out that the cross was the entrance to the mine, and that the figures showed the distances to be measured, and the arrowheads the angles to be followed, in order to arrive at the right spot.

"There ought to be no trouble in finding that mine with the help of this paper," he said to himself. "It is as plain as the nose on one's face."

He pinned this important paper to the original deed bearing the signature of Philip Aroyaz, and then turned his attention to the other papers in the secret compartment.

He was rather startled at what he found.

The first paper was the death-bed statement of one William Tooker, attested by a notary of New York City, and dated six months since.

It purported to show that the said Tooker was an old college chum of Grantley Price, and the real father of Clifford.

The dying man said that about fifteen years previous, being in danger of arrest on a charge of embezzlement, and on the eve of sailing for Australia in order to escape from America and begin life anew in the antipodes, he had persuaded his old friend Price to adopt his little motherless son Clifford, then three years old.

Pinned to this statement was a brief letter, apparently in Grantley Price's handwriting, and with his facsimile autograph appended, which stated the conditions agreed to by Tooker, under which he was willing to adopt the boy in question, and bring him up as his own child.

This letter was dated at the time of the alleged adoption, fifteen years since, and was deeply creased in its folds, stained and discolored by time, and on its face seemed to furnish conclusive proof of the dying statement made by William Tooker.

Clif drew a long breath after he had read both documents.

They seemed so real as almost to convince him of their truthfulness.

But a moment's reflection assured him that these documents were simply a part of the plot his guardian had been concocting since his mother's death to bring about his disinheritance.

"Great Scott!" he exclaimed. "What a scoundrel Mr. Fleming is! There isn't much to choose between him and his son. They are both hand-in-glove in this conspiracy to defraud me. Howard, however, seems to be more impatient to get at results than his father. Evidently he figured that my death would be the shortest, as well as the surest, road to the end in view. And I guess he was right."

Clif picked up the bogus deed and was about to tear the three menacing documents into fragments when it occurred to him that it might be better for him to save them.

"I must see Mr. Goodrich, father's lawyer, and tell him what I have learned. I will hand him these forged papers as evidence of my story. I will tell him of the attempt made on my life by my Cousin Howard, and hand him the knife I picked up under my jacket at the mouth of the Chimney. Walter will corroborate me in this. Then it will be up to Mr. Goodrich to decide whether Mr. Fleming and his son can be brought to book for their unnatural conduct toward me, and whether the Court can be induced to appoint a new guardian for me. If we could manage to induce this man Monkton to turn against Mr. Fleming, the matter would be easy; but I am afraid this is too much to hope for. Monkton is too big a scamp to be persuaded to do an honest action—that is, unless it was made worth his while. Money would buy him, I have no doubt, but I have no means of raising it. Stop! Suppose I were to go out to that ranch, mine by rights, locate that mine and work it on the quiet, I might be able to realize enough from the rough turquoises to be able to raise a sum sufficient to win the rascal over. It's a good idea, and I'll suggest it to Mr. Goodrich. I might better go there, anywhere, in fact, than stay at Beeching Hollow at the probable risk of my life. Perhaps I could get Walter to go with me. I know he'll be glad to go if he could get his father's permission."

Full of his new plans Clif determined to leave the house at once, if he could do so without attracting notice.

"For one night at least I'd like to leave my guardian and his precious son under the impression that I am dead," he said to himself. "In fact, if I am going to Arizona it would be better that no hint of my purpose should reach Mr. Fleming, to put him on his guard so that he could take measures to thwart me."

Clif replaced all the papers in the pocketbook, returned it to his pocket, hurriedly packed a small grip with sundry things he would need, and turned out his lamp.

Then he went to the window and looked out.

For an early summer evening it was an unusually dark one.

There was no moon, and the stars were obscured by drifting clouds that suggested a possible shower.

The night was admirably suited to his purpose, and he could easily leave his room by way of a trellis work that held up a vine.

"I must unlock my door before I go, or it would give rise to some suspicion. I hope no one has seen the light burning in my room."

Thus speaking, he put on his hat and softly crossed the carpet to the door.

Turning the key, he opened the door and peered out into the dimly lighted landing.

He heard voices in the hall below.

Curious to learn if the talk had any reference to his supposed absence from home, he tripped quietly over to the baluster rail and listened.

What he heard caused him to decide that he couldn't make his escape from the house any too soon.

CHAPTER IX.

CLIF LEAVES BEECHING HOLLOW ON THE QUIET.

Leaning over the baluster, Clif heard the voice of Mr. Fleming say:

"What's this you say, Howard? You saw a light in Clifford's room?"

"I did, as plain as I see you now," replied his son in quaking accents.

"Nonsense!" exclaimed Mr. Fleming, incredulously. "Why, you told me a while ago that you actually saw your cousin's ghost in the garden under the sitting-room window. The trouble with you is that your nerves are unstrung after seeing your cousin fall to his death. Persons after going through what you did this afternoon have been known to experience similar hallucinations."

"But I'm afraid to go to my room, father."

"What are you afraid of?"

"I'm afraid I might see—"

"See what? Not your cousin's ghost again?" replied Mr. Fleming, sneeringly.

"I'm afraid he's in his room," said Howard in shaky tones.

"How could he be when according to your account he must be lying dead somewhere in the depths of the Devil's Chimney?"

"I don't mean that he's really there alive. What I mean is that his spirit may have come back to the room."

"Preposterous!" ejaculated his father, impatiently. "There is no such thing as the departed returning to this earth."

"But I've read stories that told of such things."

"All stuff and nonsense!"

"Then how do you account for the light in his room? I've asked every one of the servants, and none has seen Clif since he and Walter Singleton went to the mountains this afternoon."

"You did not see any light."

"I tell you I did, father," persisted Howard, earnestly.

"You imagined that you did."

"I didn't imagine it at all. I also saw Clif's shadow on one of the blinds. He seemed to be reading a paper."

Mr. Fleming looked searchingly at his son, and seeing that he was thoroughly in earnest, he said:

"If you really saw what you assert, then it's a sign that Clifford is not dead at all. He must have escaped in some remarkable manner and has just returned to the house, entering it unobserved. Come upstairs with me and we'll see whether he's there or not. That's the best and quickest way of solving the mystery."

"I'm afraid to go up, father," objected Howard, almost whimpering from fright.

"You needn't feel alarmed while I am with you. We'll either find nothing at all, or we'll find Clifford himself in the flesh."

Mr. Fleming immediately started upstairs, whereupon Clif rushed back into his room, picked up his grip, and, getting out of the open window above the trellis vine, quickly slid to the ground, and made off into the darkness.

Howard Fleming followed his father with shaking feet, but, nevertheless, kept close at his heels.

Mr. Fleming threw open the door of his ward's chamber, and found it was dark and silent.

Not the slightest evidence was there that Clif had lately been in the room.

"I told you that it was all your imagination. The boy is dead, beyond a doubt, and you'll never see him again, unless you look at his remains when they are recovered from the bottom of the crevasse."

Howard Fleming trembled violently.

He was certain now that it was the shadow of Clif's ghost he had seen, just as if such a thing as a spook could cast a shadow.

His guilty little soul was almost paralyzed at the idea of his victim coming back to torture him by his presence.

"Oh, heavens!" he gasped. "I wish I hadn't done it."

"Done what?" asked his father, rather sharply.

"Cut the rope."

"Then you did cut the rope, eh?" replied his father, grimly. "I suspected as much. Well, don't worry. It will make you a rich man some day. All that rightfully belonged to Clifford will eventually go to you. You'll never have to work like less fortunate people, but will live on the fat of the land as long as you live. Come downstairs and I will give you a drink of something that will brace you up. You look as if you needed it."

In the meantime, Clif went on to the village and rang the bell at the Singleton residence.

Walter answered the ring and was greatly surprised to see his chum standing on the porch, grip in hand, at that hour of the night, for it was after nine o'clock.

"Hello, Clif, what's in the wind? You look as if you were going traveling. Come in."

"There's a whole lot in the wind, and I hope to go traveling a long distance," replied Clif, with a faint smile.

"The deuce you say! The folks are just going to bed. We didn't expect visitors; but of course you're always welcome at any hour of the day or night. Come up in my room and we'll have a talk."

"Who's there, Walter?" asked his father, stepping into the hall.

"Clif Price. I'm going to take him to my room. Maybe he'll stay all night with me."

As the two boys occasionally spent a night at each other's homes, nothing was thought of Clif's late visit.

"I'll be glad to stay all night if you'll let me, Walt."

"Let you! Well, say, I'm only too glad to have you. Come on upstairs."

Clif followed his friend to his room.

"Say, old chap, what did you bring the grip for? You ain't going away on a visit, are you?"

"I don't know what I'm going to do yet."

"What do you mean by that?" asked Singleton in some surprise.

"Well, I'll have to tell you a long story before you'll understand. A great deal has happened to me since you left me at my gate to-night."

"You don't say! Let me hear about it."

"By the way, before I begin my story, which you'll find a mighty strange one, do you think you could get me a bite to eat? Any old thing will do. You see I didn't have any dinner. Haven't had a mouthful since one o'clock, when I lunched as usual with Mr. Fleming and Howard."

"The dickens you say!" exclaimed Walter, in astonishment. "How is it that you didn't have your dinner?"

"You will understand why I didn't when you have heard my story."

"Your story must be a corker. Just you wait and I'll find you something in the pantry."

Walter was gone a good ten minutes, and when he came back he had a tray in his hands with a bountiful supply of cold meat, bread and butter, half an apple pie, and a jug of milk.

He placed the tray on his small center table.

"Sit up, Clif, and eat all you can stuff inside of your vest."

"Thank you, Walt. I didn't really know how hungry I was until you brought all this provender under my nose. You see, when I found out that my cousin had really cut that rope and—"

"Then you know that he did do it? I'm not surprised. I thought so from the moment we found his knife under our jackets. And I guess you were almost sure of it, too, only you didn't want to say so, for family reasons."

Clif made no reply for a minute or two.

He was busy gulping down huge mouthfuls of bread and meat.

His hunger was so keen that the food tasted uncommonly good to him.

After he had taken the edge off his appetite he began to eat and talk at the same time.

He began at the beginning with an account of the interview he had overheard between Mr. Fleming and his son, in which Howard all but admitted that he was responsible for Clif's fall down the Devil's Chimney.

"What a vicious little rascal he is," was Walter's comment. "Well, I got back at him a little bit," said Clif.

"How did you?" asked Singleton with interest.

"I nearly caused him to have a fit," and Clif went on to explain how his cousin had come upon him almost unawares while he was standing under the window, and how when Howard saw him he fell into a faint.

"Served him good and right," said Walter, with a satisfied grin.

Clif then went on to describe the interview that took place between his guardian and Monkton, and Singleton listened with amazement on every feature.

"Do you really think that you are the victim of a conspiracy to put you out of your inheritance?"

"I don't think it—I know it," replied Clif, decidedly.

"You know it!"

"I do, and I have proof of it in my pocket now. That lost pocketbook has revealed a whole lot to me. I'm going to take it over to Lawyer Goodrich first thing in the morning and have a serious consultation with him on the subject."

"My gracious!" ejaculated his chum. "What you've been telling me sounds just like the plot of a story book. Who'd ever think your guardian was such a villain?"

Clif showed Walter the two deeds—the true one and the forged—of the ranch down in Arizona, and told him that he had the key to the turquoise mine, the entrance to which was at a certain spot on the property.

"I am in hopes of taking a trip there right away," he said.

"What! To Arizona?"

"Yes. And I want you to go with me if you can get your father's permission to do so."

"Gee! That would just suit me. He might let me go with you. As vacation time has just begun, it would be a fine trip for us both."

"That's right. I'd hate to go way out there alone. I must talk your father into letting you come with me."

"You haven't told me your object in going to that ranch of yours, for it certainly is yours, now that both your father and mother are dead."

"My object in going there is to raise money for a certain purpose I have in view by secretly digging out a quantity of the rough turquoises and then selling them."

Walter was greatly taken with the idea of helping his chum dig for the precious stones in question, and the two boys remained up till after midnight talking and concocting plans for the near future.

CHAPTER X.

CAUGHT AT THE STATION.

While Clif and Walter were talking together in the latter's room, Mr. Fleming pretended to be in a dreadful sweat over the unexplained absence of his ward.

He organized a search party and started, first of all as a blind, for the Witches' Ravine, which was thoroughly explored, naturally without success.

Then he led the way to other spots in the mountains, and finally to the mouth of the Devil's Chimney.

Howard, of course, went along with the party, for nothing could have induced him to remain behind at the house.

"My gracious!" exclaimed Mr. Fleming, picking up the short end of the severed rope that was attached to the dead tree. "The boys have been here, and I'm afraid a terrible accident has happened to one or both of them. See! This rope has been cut in two by the sharp rock."

The three men servants, who accompanied the acting master of Beeching Hollow and his son, gazed in horror at this evidence of a calamity.

Clif Price, the young heir, was a great favorite with them, and they deplored the idea that anything serious had happened to him.

Mr. Fleming and his son flashed their lanterns down the Chimney, expecting to see Walter Singleton roosting in utter misery on the shelf thirty feet below.

To their surprise there was no sign of him.

"Where could he have got to?" whispered Howard.

Then all at once he recollects that the jackets belonging to the two boys were not on the ground where he had left them.

What did it all mean?

Had Walter managed to escape from his predicament and taken his friend's jacket as well as his own with him?

How could he have crawled up that thirty feet of bare rock?

Father and son were both greatly puzzled to account for the state of affairs.

Howard had, at his father's suggestion, brought a rope of sufficient length to reach the shelf in question.

This was now made fast to the tree, the boy slid down, and, standing in a listening attitude, called out repeatedly the names of Clif and Walter.

Not the slightest sound, save a faint echo of his own voice, came back to him.

"It's mighty strange where Walter Singleton went to. It is possible that he may have fallen from this shelf in the dark, and is dead down there also. Had he got out of this place somehow he surely would have called at the house to tell the news of Clif's death. I'm afraid he's a goner, too; but who the deuce carried off their jackets?"

He signaled to be drawn up, and was presently standing on the rocks above once more.

"No use staying here any longer, father," said Howard. "Walter Singleton has either got out somehow, or he fell into the Chimney after it got dark."

"If he escaped it's a wonder he didn't stop at the house and notify us of Clifford's death," replied Mr. Fleming. "I don't believe he got out."

"We didn't leave the house until half-past eight. If he was missing at home, it's a wonder his folks didn't send over to inquire about him."

"He's so accustomed to stay with Clifford, sometimes over night, that his parents would suppose he remained at the Hollow."

"That's right, too. Do you think we'd better send over to his house and ask if he has returned home?"

"No. For if he hasn't got home, as I'm afraid is the case, it would alarm his folks. Time enough for them to learn the worst in the morning."

"But I don't understand what became of the two jackets that were up here. Maybe somebody was up here and helped Walter out."

"That isn't an unreasonable supposition, but in that case he certainly would have stopped at the house, for it's on his road home."

"Well, I can't understand what happened to him, then."

"Nor I, unless he fell into the crevasse. We'll let the matter rest as it is until morning."

The party returned to Beeching Hollow.

That night Howard wouldn't sleep in his own room, which adjoined his cousin's, but insisted on using the lounge in his father's room.

After breakfast next morning Clif left the Singleton home and made his way to the residence of Lawyer Goodrich.

Here he spent two hours in consultation with his late father's attorney.

The lawyer was amazed at his revelations, and was at first inclined to ridicule his story, but when he produced the documents from the red pocketbook he took a different view of the matter.

Mr. Goodrich did not think that there was sufficient ground to maintain a case against Mr. Fleming, as it was impossible for Clif to produce corroborative evidence to sustain his side of the matter, and Mr. Fleming's word to the contrary was as good as his own.

"You see, my boy, you, as the plaintiff, would have to produce proof sufficient to overcome any reasonable doubt as to the guilt of your guardian in the transaction. The best point you have is young Fleming's attempt on your life, but even there, the production of his knife, and the fact that the rope shows plainly that it was cut, is no proof that it was Howard Fleming who did the deed. No one saw him do it, and it is probable no one saw him go up the mountain after you. He would naturally deny his agency in the affair, claim that he had lost his knife, and that some unknown enemy of yours found it, and is the real guilty one. You couldn't make a case against him."

Clif had to admit that as the matter stood he was powerless to punish his cousin.

"If we produced these papers against Mr. Fleming," went on the lawyer, "we would have to prove that the spurious ones were actually forgeries. Your father's signature is so cleverly executed that I myself could not swear it is not genuine. Your suggestion of trying to buy over Monkton is good. I see no other way of thwarting Mr. Fleming's game. He is evidently an uncommonly smart rascal, and has calculated every move. If he had not accidentally lost this pocketbook I am afraid you would ultimately have been placed in a bad position. As the confidant of your mother he has probably learned all the particulars of your birth, and has managed to get hold of and destroy the evidence that would set you right. Or at least he has fixed matters so that it would be next to impossible to trace the truth to its fountain-head. Such things have been done before."

Clif admitted the clearness of the lawyer's reasoning.

Then he submitted his plan of going to Arizona, locating the mine, and working it on the quiet until he had accumulated a fund large enough to make an attempt to bribe Monkton.

Lawyer Goodrich had his doubts as to the feasibility of the plan, but agreed that for the present Clif would probably be safer in Arizona than at Beeching Hollow.

"I want to leave Macedonia at once, before Mr. Fleming finds out that I am not really dead. I think it is likely that my friend, Walter Singleton, will go with me. Of course, I'll have to have a little money to pay my expenses. Are you willing to advance me $100 or so?"

"Certainly I will, my boy. I'll let you have $250. If you run short, write me and I will send you more."

"Thank you, sir. In the meantime I hope you will try and keep an eye on Mr. Fleming's movements, and let me know by telegraph to Tucson if he starts for the ranch, so that I may be on the lookout for him."

"I will keep a bright eye out for your interests, Clifford, never fear. Your father and I were warm personal friends, and I am only too glad to be of service to you. It will be my aim to see that you get your rights."

Clif left the lawyer's house and returned to the Singleton place, where Walter was impatiently waiting for him.

Nothing as yet had been heard from Beeching Hollow, much to Clif's satisfaction.

Clif and Walter had an interview with Mr. Singleton with reference to the Western trip, and after considerable talk it was finally agreed that Walter, who was not ready to start immediately, should join Clif at the Planters' Hotel in St. Louis a week from that day.

This point having been settled to the satisfaction of the two boys, lunch was announced, and after it was over Clif, grip in hand, and accompanied by Walter, started for the railroad station to catch the 2:30 accommodation bound west.

They reached the outlying station half an hour ahead of train time, and, seating themselves at one end of the platform beside a big packing-case, they waited for the train to come along.

Their conversation was wholly in connection with the ranch and the turquoise mine, and so absorbed were they in their plans for the immediate future that they did not observe the approach of two men who had just alighted from a buggy.

The newcomers were Edward Fleming and Elliot Monkton. Fleming and Monkton had come to terms, and the latter had come to take the train for the nearest city to buy a suitable rope with which to descend into the depths of the Devil's Chimney in quest of the red pocketbook.

The two men came to a stop on the other side of the packing-case, and instantly Mr. Fleming's sharp ears had caught the familiar sound of his ward's voice.

Startled and astonished, he looked over the top of the case and saw Clif and his friend, Singleton, sitting there.

Clif had the red pocketbook in his hand, and was showing the diagram of the mine to Walter.

Mr. Fleming was a quick thinker.

It was clear to him that his nephew had escaped the fate supposed to have befallen him, and, moreover, had investigated the contents of the lost pocketbook.

His presence at the station, with the grip beside him, showed that he was on the point of taking a journey without informing his guardian of his intentions.

He must be headed off and the pocketbook taken from him.

Mr. Fleming drew back and held a whispered conversation with his partner in guilt.

They decided to listen to the conversation between the boys and try to determine just how the case stood.

Inside of ten minutes they had learned enough to confirm Mr. Fleming's worst fears—Clif knew everything.

At that moment the whistle of the train announced its approach from the east.

Clif and Walter rose to their feet.

"Well, old man," said Clif, "I'll see you in St. Louis a week from to-day, eh?"

"Sure thing," replied Singleton.

"I'm afraid not," replied a voice behind them.

They turned quickly, and there stood Mr. Fleming and his friend, Monkton, who regarded Clif with sardonic satisfaction.

CHAPTER XI.

A CATASTROPHE ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

"I am surprised to see you here, Clifford," said Mr. Fleming, in a conciliatory tone. "Where were you last night?"

"I don't believe it makes any difference to you where I was," retorted Clif, aggressively.

"It makes a great deal of difference to me. I am your guardian, and am bound to look after you."

"You needn't worry yourself about me after this. I am going away to spend my vacation in the West."

"Hasn't it occurred to you that I should be consulted in the matter?"

"No, sir. I don't recognize your authority any longer."

"I am afraid that such a remarkable decision on your part will hardly hold water. I stand toward you in the place of your father."

"My real father, or Mr. William Tooker, whom it appears you contemplate bringing forward on paper as my father?"

Mr. Fleming caught his breath at this evidence of the extent of his ward's knowledge of his private plans.

Just then the train rushed up to the station.

A trunk was dumped off on the platform and one passenger alighted.

"All aboard," cried the conductor, signalling the engineer to go ahead.

"Look out, Clif, or you'll lose your train," warned Singleton in his ear.

Clif immediately started for the nearest car, but Monkton headed him off and tried to grab him.

The boy grew desperate as he saw the cars begin to move off.

Seeing that he couldn't reach the train that way, he started for the back of the building at top speed.

Fleming and Monkton followed him as fast as they could.

The boy rushed into and across the waiting room.

This move was unexpected by his enemies, who thought he meant to try to escape down the road.

Monkton saw that he could have cut him off if he had waited outside.

It was too late now to rectify that error.

They did not believe that the fugitive could reach the moving cars now.

The train was pulling out of the station as Clifford Price darted out on the platform with Fleming and Monkton at his heels.

"Stop him! Stop that boy!" roared Monkton.

Clif darted for the last car and swung himself aboard.

Then he turned and bowed mockingly at his disappointed pursuers.

"He's escaped us!" ejaculated Mr. Fleming, furiously. "With the contents of the pocketbook in his possession, too. What is to be done?"

"We must follow him by the next train," replied Monkton.

"The next train is the through Pacific Express, and it doesn't stop here."

"Perhaps it can be flagged," suggested Monkton.

"No. That's against the regulations."

"Then we'll have to take the next train that does stop here."

"The boy will have four hours start of us."

"That can't be helped. We've got to follow him, for there's a fortune at stake. We must recover those papers at any cost."

"Yes, we must get them back," nodded Mr. Fleming.

"And you'd better see to it that this boy does not get back, or you may have to face awkward charges in court. Now that he's wise to your plans there is no certainty that your scheme will succeed as long as he is alive."

"I hope we shall be able to overhaul him," said Fleming. "He will probably expect that we will follow him, and will use every endeavor to throw us off his track. It may prove to be a case of hunting for a needle in a haystack."

"Not at all. Didn't you hear him say to that other lad that he'd meet him in St. Louis a week from to-day?"

"That's so. I forgot about it."

"If we fail to overhaul him between here and that city, we ought to be able to catch him there. If I was you I'd telegraph to the police to be on the lookout for him, and order them to arrest him on his arrival."

"That won't do. It would lead to explanations that I want to avoid. We must catch him ourselves. Come, we'll return to Beeching Hollow, and I'll prepare for the trip."

They boarded the buggy and drove off down the road, intending to return in time to take the 6:30 local westward.

The train which bore Clif westward stopped at frequent intervals until it reached the flourishing city of Delhi at 5:30.

Clif left it there and went into the railroad eating house for his supper, for he intended to board the Pacific Express as soon as it reached that place.

He had just finished his meal when the express pulled in, and stopped twenty minutes for the passengers to eat.

Clif bought a ticket through to St. Louis, with sleeper accommodations, and when the express pulled out for the southwest he was aboard.

On the following afternoon he reached the metropolis of Missouri and was driven to the Planters' Hotel, where he registered.

"I've got five days to put in here before Walt shows up," he said to himself, "so I suppose I might as well do the town on my own hook. It was most unfortunate that Mr. Fleming should have caught me leaving Macedonia. I had hoped to throw him off my track entirely. Now I suppose he will chase me all the way to Arizona and give me no end of trouble. Well, the only thing I can do is to be on the lookout for him. He is not likely to run across me on the way, and he hasn't any idea that I have arranged to stop over in this city. My five days' wait here will give him time to reach the ranch ahead of me. I suppose he'll bring Monkton with him to assist in capturing me and getting possession of the red pocketbook. The safest thing for me to do is to take the diagram of the mine out of the wallet and stitch it up in my jacket. It wouldn't be a bad idea to make another drawing like it, altering the positions of the cross and the direction of the arrowheads. Then if he should happen to corner me and get possession of the pocketbook he would be all at sea trying to locate the mine. As for the other documents, they're safe with Mr. Goodrich, and he'll never get hold of them."

So that evening Clif got a piece of paper similar to the one on which the diagram was drawn and made an altered duplicate with great care.

He put the bogus diagram into the secret compartment of the wallet, while the genuine one he placed inside of his right stocking.

"Now Mr. Fleming is at liberty to take his pocketbook whenever he gets the chance," said Clif, with a chuckle.

In an evening paper he saw the advertisement of an excursion trip down the Mississippi River for the next day, and he decided to avail himself of the chance to see what he could of the Father of Waters.

Accordingly he made all the necessary inquiries that evening as to the boat wharf and the easiest way of getting there.

The steamer was announced to leave at nine o'clock, so Clif left an early call at the office before he went to his room.

He had his breakfast at 7:30, and then took a car for the nearest point to the boat landing.

Two hours later Mr. Fleming and Monkton entered the Planters' Hotel and consulted the register at the office.

They found, as they expected, that Clif had arrived the preceding afternoon.

Mr. Fleming asked for him, and the clerk answered that the lad had gone on an excursion down the river and would not be back until seven or eight that evening.

Fleming and his side partner then left with the intention of returning the next morning.

While the two rascals were pursuing their investigations, Clif was on the river enjoying the novelty of the splendid sail, and admiring, at a respectable distance, a very pretty girl with golden hair and blue eyes, who was also on board with a gentleman who looked to be her father.

"Gee! She's a peach," said the boy to himself. "I wish I could make her acquaintance."

There seemed to be very little chance of his doing so, though their eyes met several times, and the girl seemed to take as much interest in Clif as he did in her.

Dinner was served on board at half-past twelve, and much to Clif's satisfaction, the gentleman and his daughter took seats next to him.

Our hero tried to improve the opportunity by passing her such dishes as lay within his reach, for which he received from her a winning smile and a thank you.

After dinner he watched where she and her father took seats in the stern of the steamer, and he secured a camp chair as close to her as he dared go.

For the next hour he divided his attention about equally between the pretty girl and the panoramic view of the shores of the Mississippi.

It was about this time that the boat made a wide sweep around to head back up the river.

Hardly was her nose pointed northward when, without the slightest warning, a tremendous explosion shook her from stem to stern.

The force of the shock seemed to tear her asunder.

Clif felt himself raised in a mass of debris and fairly blown into the river, and the next thing he knew he was sinking down into the cool depths of the water.

CHAPTER XII.

CLIF SAVES THE LIFE OF THE GIRL WITH THE GOLDEN HAIR.

Clif, however, was a splendid swimmer, and thoroughly at home in the water.

Although he was pretty well dazed when he struck and disappeared under the surface of the river, contact with the cool water brought all his senses back to him and he pushed himself toward the surface.

When his head shot above the water, and he had taken a good breath of fresh air into his lungs, he was in full control of his faculties.

His first thought was for the lovely young girl who had occupied a seat on the boat so near himself, and he looked around in search of her, determined to save her life at any risk to himself.

The river all about was covered with struggling victims of the disaster and pieces of shattered wood from the wrecked steamer.

The boat herself was close at hand, but in a roaring blaze of fire that would shortly consume what was left of her above the water-line.

A cluster of passengers were gathered on her lower deck forward crying frantically for help, while a score of boats and small craft from either shore were trying to reach the locality in time to rescue as many of the unfortunates as the circumstances would permit.

Clif saw no sign of the golden-haired girl anywhere around, and his heart sank as he pictured her lying in the last throes of suffocation at the bottom of the river.

As he swam hither and thither in a vain endeavor to single her out among the many struggling forms in that vicinity, the object of his thoughts suddenly rose to the surface within a yard of him.

He saw her at once, and with a cry of satisfaction he pushed toward and seized her just as she commenced to struggle and throw up her hands.

He had been careful to get a back grasp on her under her arms, so as to avoid her frantic clutch.

"Don't struggle so. Be quiet and I'll save you," he said reassuringly in her ears.

The girl seemed to understand and, feeling that she was being sustained above the water, ceased all her movements.

Finding that she was behaving in a sensible way, he worked around to her side and, supporting her with one arm, struck out with the other for a large piece of wreckage floating near by.

Reaching it, he told her to grab hold, and she did so at once.

Then their eyes met and she recognized him with a faint smile.

"My father!" she breathed. "Where is he?"

"Can he swim?" asked Clif.

"Oh, yes; but he may have been killed by that awful shock."

"I guess not," he answered cheerily, by way of encouraging her. "As long as he can swim, he'll be saved by one of those boats that are coming up."

"Oh, I hope so—I hope so," she murmured. "I have nobody but papa, and it would kill me if anything happened to him."

"Nothing will happen to him if he can keep above water for a while."

"You were so good to save me from going down again. I know I owe my life to you. I shall always be grateful to you," she said fervently.

"Don't mention it, miss. I thought of you right away, for I was sitting close to you on the boat, and determined to save you if you were in sight."

"Yes, I remember you. You sat next to me at the table, and were very polite to me. Father said that you seemed to be a very nice boy."

While they were talking a rowboat came up and they were taken on board.

The boatmen rowed around, picked up several others, and were about starting for the shore when Clif saw a man, quite exhausted, clinging to a fragment that was hardly buoyant enough to support him.

He thought the man looked like the fair girl's father, and he called the rowers' attention to him.

"The boat is overcrowded now. We can't take another one aboard," was the reply.

"Let him have my place, then," answered the generous lad. "I'm a good swimmer. I'll take my chances overboard."

The girl seized his hand tremulously as he rose to spring into the water and help the man near by into the boat.

"Don't go," she whispered. "You might be drowned."

"Don't worry. That man is your father, I think. Better for you and him, too, that he be taken into the boat."

As he spoke she looked eagerly at the man in the water and then screamed:

"Father! It is my father. Oh, save him!"

Splash went Clif into the river, and in another moment he was supporting and guiding the gentleman to the boat.

He was carefully lifted in and given Clif's place, and then the boat was propelled shoreward with the brave boy clinging to the top of the rudder.

In fifteen minutes the boat was brought up against the bank of the river, on the Illinois shore, and her passengers assisted to land.

The golden-haired girl, now no longer anxious about her father, ran to Clif as he walked out of the river like a dripping Newfoundland dog, and seized him by the hand.

"You are so good and noble," she cried, looking gratefully into his face. "You helped to save my father when the men would have left him behind. I shall never forget you—never!"

She drew him toward her father, to whom she had already confided the fact that she owed her own life to Clif.

The gentleman grasped him by the hand and, with tears in his eyes, thanked him for what he had done for his daughter, as well as for himself.

"What is your name, my lad?"

"Clifford Price."

"My name is Colwell, and this is my daughter Florence."

Clif bowed and smiled.

"I am happy to know you, Mr. Colwell, and you, too, Miss Florence," he said.

"Come," said the gentleman. "Let us follow the others. There are houses yonder where we can probably get our clothes dried. We cannot very well return to St. Louis in this condition."

The people in the neighborhood were only too happy to render the victims of the disaster all the assistance in their power.

Mr. Colwell, his daughter and Clif were taken into one of the houses near by, where Florence and a drenched lady that came on the boat were shown to a room to undress, while Mr. Colwell and our hero were assigned to another.

In removing his socks Clif thought of the precious diagram with some misgivings, but found that, though it was water-soaked, none of the ink had spread so as to render any part of it illegible.

He dried it on the window sill in the sun, while he sat near wrapped in a blanket.

While waiting for his clothes to dry Clif and Mr. Colwell became very well acquainted.

The gentleman took a great fancy to the plucky boy, and Clif on his part was equally well taken with Mr. Colwell.

So much so indeed that he told him his whole history, and the reason that brought him West and was taking him to his late father's ranch in Pinal County, Arizona.

Mr. Colwell was much impressed by the boy's story, and promised to assist him in his efforts to get his rights.

"I am pretty well off, Clifford—you will permit me to so address you after what you have done for me and my only child—and it will give me great pleasure as well as satisfaction to cancel my obligation to you in as substantial a way as I can. We are going to San Francisco by the Southern Pacific route, which will take us through Tucson, Arizona. You and your friend, whom you are waiting for, shall go with us. We will break our trip at Tucson, and while my daughter remains at a hotel in that town I will accompany you both to the ranch and help you find your mine, and protect you to the fullest extent of my ability."

"I am very much obliged to you, sir, for your generous offer, and accept it with pleasure, all the more as I feel certain that my faithless guardian and his accomplice are on my track, and will probably stop at nothing to accomplish their purpose."

"I will stand by you, never fear. Here are our clothes now. Let us get into them. Then we will try and get back to St. Louis as soon as possible. This has been a most unfortunate excursion. I fear many people have lost their lives, and many more have suffered serious injuries. The boat must have had an old and defective boiler. The inspectors whose business it is to pass on such things have been lax in their duties. After all, it is the same old story. In spite of repeated accidents to river and other steamers the same thing with variations happens right along. The newspapers will make a great outcry over this affair, and call for needed reforms. There will, of course, be an investigation; but you will find that little will be done in the long run."

They got a conveyance to take them to the nearest railroad station, and on their way up to East St. Louis Mr. Colwell suggested that Clif transfer himself from the Planters' Hotel to the Carondelet, where the Cowells were stopping, and consider himself as Mr. Colwell's guest during the rest of his stay in the city.

"You can leave word with the clerk to inform your friend, Singleton, when he comes, where he can find you."

Clif liked the idea very much, especially as Florence joined in the invitation with her father, and so when they had crossed the river to St. Louis proper, he went with them to the Carondelet to take dinner.

After the meal he returned to the Planters' Hotel, told the clerk that he was going to leave in the morning, and that he was to direct his friend, whom he expected to arrive on Wednesday of the next week, that he would be found at the Carondelet.

The clerk said all right, and then mentioned the fact that two men had called that morning and asked for him.

"Did they leave their names?" he asked, with a strong suspicion as to the identity of his visitors.

"No. They merely asked if you were in. And when I told them that you had gone on a river excursion they went away."

"Well, I have no friends in this city, but I have two enemies who are following me on my journey to the Southwest. When those chaps call again tell them I have left the city, and you will do me a favor."

The clerk nodded and Clif went to his room.

Next morning he went to the Carondelet Hotel.

CHAPTER XIII.

WALTER SINGLETON JOINS CLIF AT ST. LOUIS.

When Mr. Fleming read the account of the steamboat disaster on the river in the evening paper he hardly knew whether to be sorry or glad at the possibility of his ward having lost his life.

The boy's death would certainly have afforded him the greatest satisfaction but for the fact that he carried that diagram of the location of the turquoise mine on his person.

Still there was hope in the fact that his body, if he was among the lost, would probably be recovered from the river and then Mr. Fleming would no doubt find the red pocketbook on his person.

After a consultation with Monkton, both went around to the Planters' Hotel next morning to make inquiries.

Then they found that Clif had turned up all right on the evening before, having been so fortunate as to escape the fate that overtook more than fifty of the excursionists.

The clerk, complying with Clif's request, told Mr. Fleming that the boy had left the hotel that morning with the intention of taking a train out of the city.

"That's funny," said Monkton, when Mr. Fleming told him. "He was to stay here until next Wednesday, when that Singleton boy was to join him."

"He must have made some change in his arrangements, then. The best thing we can do is to take a train for Tucson at once. We will no doubt find him there, as I am satisfied that the ranch is his objective point."

"There's little doubt about that," agreed Monkton. "In my mind the best and safest way to deal with him is to waylay him at or on his way to the ranch. Your and I ought to be easily able to do up both him and young Singleton. We will have a hundred chances in Arizona to effect our object to one elsewhere."

"I guess you're right, Monkton," replied Mr. Fleming. "We'll look up the Santa Fe time-tables and buy tickets for Tucson. We're bound to catch the boys at the ranch, anyway."

Late that afternoon the two rascals left St. Louis for Arizona by the Santa Fe route.

During the next few days Clif enjoyed himself immensely escorting Florence Cowell to various points of interest in the city.

On Monday afternoon he received a telegram from Walter Singleton informing him that his chum would leave the village of Macedonia next morning for Delhi to catch the Pacific Express for St. Louis, which would land him in that city late Wednesday afternoon, according to previous arrangements.

Clif decided to go to the depot and meet his friend instead of letting him go to the Planters' Hotel.

Accordingly, after finding out the exact time when the express was due, he took his way to the Union station.

He stood at the exit gate while the St. Louis passengers filed out, and presently spied his chum coming along, grip in hand.

"Hello, Walt," he exclaimed, grabbing him by the arm.

"Why, hello, Clif," returned the delighted newcomer. "I didn't expect to see you here."

"Thought I'd come and meet you, as I've left the Planters' Hotel and taken up quarters at the Carondelet."

"Glad you came. How came you to make the change? The Carondelet is more expensive, isn't it?"

"Yes. It's one of the best hotels in the city. It's not costing me anything, however."

"It isn't? How is that?" asked Walter, in surprise.

"I'm the guest of a Mr. Warren Cowell and his daughter."

"The dickens you are! Who are they?"

"I made their acquaintance in rather a sensational way."

"You did, eh?"

"I'll tell you how it came about. On the morning after the day I reached here I went on an excursion down the Mississippi. Mr. Cowell and his daughter were on board with probably a couple of hundred others. As the steamer was making the turn to come back, about forty miles below here, her boiler exploded."

"What?"

"Her boiler went up and I, with the rest of the passengers seated on the deck astern, was blown into the river. Didn't you hear anything about the accident? It was probably printed in some shape in most all of the papers of the country. Fifty people lost their lives."

"I didn't read anything about it," replied Singleton.

"Well, I saved the life of Florence Cowell, and also assisted her father out of the river. That's how I made their acquaintance, and I am pretty solid with them."

"I should think you would be after that."

"Florence is the finest girl I ever knew, and one of the prettiest. She's got golden hair, blue eyes, a peaches-and-cream complexion, and—"

"You're dead gone on her, why don't you say?" grinned Walter.

"Well, I don't deny but I think a whole lot of her," admitted Clif, flushing up in a guilty way.

"Of course you do. I can see it in your face," laughed Singleton.

Clif then went on to tell his chum how Mr. Cowell and his daughter were going to the Pacific slope over the Santa Fe and Southern Pacific routes.

"He has volunteered to see us through with the object of our visit to Arizona."

"No! Is that so?"

"Yes. I've told him everything about my circumstances, and he says he's going to stand by me."

"That's first rate. I suppose you'll not be surprised to learn that your guardian and his friend, Monkton, left Macedonia the same afternoon you did, and, of course, they're chasing you."

"I know it. They were in the city last week looking for me."

"Did you see them?"

"No; but they got onto the fact that I was stopping at the Planters' Hotel, and they came there inquiring for me."

"They did? They must have overheard us talking at the station that day. Are they here yet?"

"I haven't seen or heard from them if they are. I told the clerk at the Planters' to tell them if they called again that I had left the city. In that case they probably supposed I had gone to Tucson, and took a train for that point. If they did that, they'll be disappointed to find that I was not there. It is pretty certain, though, that they'll wait there for us to turn up, then there'll be something doing. I've bought a revolver to protect myself. It wouldn't be a bad idea for you to get one, too, though, of course, they've no designs against you."

"I'll buy one. When do we start for Arizona?"

"To-morrow morning. The Cowells are all ready to continue their journey. We have been waiting for you to arrive."

By this time they had reached the Carondelet Hotel, and Clif carried his chum to his own room after he had registered.

A little later he took Walter to the Cowells' apartments and introduced him to Florence and her father.

Walter was much impressed by Florence's beauty and vivacious manner, and he soon had the opportunity of observing that his friend was the whole thing with her.

After dinner they went to the theater, and next morning at eight the little party took the morning express over the Santa Fe road for the Southwest.

CHAPTER XIV.

OFF FOR THE RANCH.

On the evening of the second day after leaving St. Louis the Pacific Express dropped Mr. Warren Cowell, his daughter, Clif Price and Walter Singleton at Tucson, Arizona.

They boarded a bus for the Tucson House.

Two men standing in the shadow of the station noted the arrival of the party.

The reader need scarcely be told that the men were Fleming and Monkton, who had been in town several days.

They had come every evening to the station to watch the arrivals by the train, on the lookout for Clif and his companion.

At last their vigilance was rewarded.

"The boys seem to have made the acquaintance of some tourist and his daughter," said Fleming.

"What of it?" replied Monkton. "The gentleman and the girl will probably go on to-morrow night. They've merely stopped over to see the town. There's no hurry getting at the boy. A day or two more or less amounts to nothing. We're all ready to follow them to the ranch as soon as they start."

"Well, they'll be at the Tucson House to-night at any rate. Probably after supper they'll take a look around town. We might find a chance to catch them somewhere. They're not likely to be on their guard, as they have no reason to suspect that we have followed them here."

"If they'd only wander into Bunsen's Music Hall we could manage to trap them, I think. The only difficulty in the way is that this tourist will probably take in the sights with them. Our aim must be to separate your nephew from his companion if we can."

"We'll see what we can do. We must take care, however, that neither of the boys spots us."

"Of course."

Thus speaking, the two conspirators walked up the street toward Bunsen's Hotel, which adjoined the music hall, where they had quarters, and were on good terms with many of the tough employees of the establishment.

Although the Tucson House was the best hotel in the town, it was not to be compared with even a city second-class hotel.

The table and the rooms, however, were as good as could be expected in that sparsely settled section of our country, and Mr. Cowell and his party had no kick coming.

After supper the four started out to view the town, which was at its best, or worst, whichever you call it, after dark.

There were drinking saloons, gambling joints, and such, in full blast, with wide open doors as an invitation to the passerby.

There was no lack of excitement at night in Tucson, and you didn't have to go far in any direction to find it.

As a rule, the places were orderly and well regulated, but, of course, there were some establishments where the limit was squeezed almost to the breaking point.

Bunsen's Music Hall was one of the most notorious resorts in town.

It was a combined barroom and theater where a lengthy vaudeville show held forth till midnight.

After the show the tables and chairs were moved to the sides of the main room and dancing was indulged in until daylight.

There were gambling rooms somewhere upstairs that were easy of access.

Once in a while there was a shooting scrape in Bunsen's, but no one seemed to get excited over such things.

The hotel next door was patronized chiefly by shady characters and the toughest of town visitors.

Mr. Fleming and Monkton were the most respectable looking of its patrons, but the rest of the crowd seemed to recognize them as birds of a feather, and they attracted no particular attention.

Clif Price walked with Florence.

Her fresh beauty and innocence drew a good deal of notice to her and her companion as they walked past the brilliantly lighted establishments that resounded with noise or melody, as the case might be.

At some little distance behind the party walked Fleming and Monkton, with their soft, wide-brimmed hats pulled well down over their foreheads.

The presence of the girl with Clif rather upset their calculations, for it was evident that she would not be introduced to the interior of any of the pleasure resorts.

It therefore looked as if Clif was safe from their machinations for that night.

And such proved to be the case, for after an hour's jaunt Mr. Cowell and his party returned to the Tucson House and retired.

Next morning Mr. Cowell accompanied the boys to the county clerk's office, where they got full particulars of the location of the ranch.

Afterward they went to the Tucson cemetery where Clif's father was buried.

Grantley Price's grave looked neglected and rather forlorn, like the majority of the last resting places of Tucson's dead.

They identified it by a small headstone which Mr. Fleming had caused to be put there.

After returning to the hotel for the midday meal, they spent the afternoon making purchases and sundry arrangements for their trip to the ranch.

Mr. Cowell decided that it would not be well to leave Florence alone at the hotel until their return, as there was no telling when they would get back.

She herself would have put up a vigorous protest if such a suggestion had been advanced.

She was fully prepared to rough it with her father and the boys, and asserted that she was rather pleased with the novelty of the contemplated expedition.

So it was arranged that she was to go along, and steps were taken to insure her comfort as much as possible.

Fleming and Monkton were somewhat disgruntled when they found that Mr. Cowell and his daughter did not leave that night by the Pacific Express as they had expected.

They were still more upset when they saw the party depart next morning in a well-filled, covered wagon, drawn by a spanking team of horses, and take the road for the northern spur of the Sierra de la Santa Catarina mountains.

They did not need to inquire whither the party was bound.

They easily guessed that the Price ranch was the objective point.

"It looks as if we had our work cut out for us now," said

Monkton. "It is clear that boy is smarter than we took him to be. He has found a good friend who is ready to help him through with his project. It is not unlikely the boy has offered him an interest in the mine, and thus secured his co-operation. We'll have to adopt strong measures now, or throw up our hands. I hope you have the sand to see the matter through to the end. You have more at stake than I. If I was in your shoes I'd take such measures as would end in the wiping out of that lad. While he lives your hold on the mine, as well as on Beeching Hollow, is mighty precarious. I hope you realize this."

"I realize it only too well," replied Mr. Fleming, moodily. "Well, what do you propose?"

"Will you be guided by me?"

"I will. I have no other recourse."

"Very good. Let's go back to Bunsen's. We can pick up a couple of chaps there who, for a consideration, will be glad to help us out in this matter."

"All right. I leave the arrangements to you. Your interests are identified with mine. We are now hand-in-glove if we never were before. In this chase for a fortune we've got to win, or the future has nothing in it for either of us."

"Now you're talking, Fleming. I'm out for a quarter interest in the mine, and I'm going to have it, or learn the reason why not."

About the middle of the afternoon Fleming, Monkton and two hard-looking individuals, all armed, mounted on sturdy horses, with several days' supplies strapped behind their saddles, left Tucson by the same road taken earlier in the day by the covered wagon.

Their destination also was the northern spur of the Sierra de la Santa Catarina mountains, where the deserted Price ranch lay among the foothills.

CHAPTER XV.

THE DESERTED RANCH.

Mr. Cowell drove the wagon for the first hour after leaving Tucson, then Clif took a turn at the reins, and after sixty minutes of it yielded up the seat to Singleton.

At the end of the third hour they decided it was time for the noonday repast.

The horses were liberated from the wagon and tethered with long ropes in the grass, while the two boys, Florence and her father sat down in the shade of a tree and ate a light lunch prepared for them by the hotel people.

After an hour's rest the horses were hitched up again, and the journey toward the Price ranch resumed, Mr. Cowell and the boys alternating as before in the driver's seat.

Arizona has the reputation of being a pretty hot State in the summer time, and it fully sustained its reputation that day.

Mr. Cowell was sorry that he hadn't taken the hotel keeper's advice and postponed the journey until after sundown.

The horses, being used to the climatic conditions, didn't suffer as much in the sun as the four travelers in the shade of the canvas wagon flap.

As the sun neared the horizon the atmosphere grew more bearable.

Close to sundown another halt was made for supper.

This time a fire was built by the roadside and a pot of coffee made by Miss Florence, while Clif fried a mess of bacon and eggs.

Plenty of good bread and butter, with a whole pie to top off their al fresco banquet, completed a very satisfactory meal.

"How far have we come?" asked Walter.

"About forty miles," replied Mr. Cowell.

"How far have we yet to go to reach the ranch?"

"Twenty miles or so; but we'll make much better time for the balance of the trip as the air is cooler, and the temperature will continue to drop until sunrise. We ought to reach the ranch by half-past nine at the latest."

It was dusk when they resumed the last stage of their journey.

The mountain range was on their right with a vast plain stretching away to the northwest, west and south.

As the light of day faded away the stars came out with unusual brilliancy, promising a perfect night.

After they had covered the greater part of the twenty miles the moon rose above the mountain range and flooded the great plain with a soft, mellow radiance.

"It's a lovely night, isn't it, Clif?" asked Florence enthusiastically.

"Fine," he replied. "Almost as lovely as—"

"What?" she asked, when he paused.

"Yourself," he whispered in her ear.

Florence blushed vividly, but as it was dark Clif didn't notice it.

They were sitting back in the wagon, while Mr. Cowell and Singleton occupied the driver's seat.

"I suppose when you go on to California you'll forget all about me," said Clif, feeling as if their separation would prove a serious matter for him.

"I shall never forget you," she answered softly.

"Do you really mean that?" he asked eagerly.

"I do. How could I forget you when I owe my life to you?"

"I know you feel grateful to me, but I'd much rather that you'd remember me for a different reason."

"A different reason?" she asked. "I don't understand you."

"Well, if you don't understand, I had better not try to explain. I thought—however, it doesn't matter. I hope you will have a good time, and that I shall see you again when you come East."

"Of course you will see me again. You must come and pay us a nice long visit at our home in Chicago."

"I shall be glad to do so if I can. I almost wish I hadn't met you, because—well, because I know I shall miss you a whole lot after you are gone. I shall feel as if there was something missing that cannot be replaced until we meet once more."

"I shall miss you, of course, too," she answered in a low voice. "I wish you were going with us. Don't you think you could manage to do so? Father would be very glad to have you. He told me so last night."

"Nothing would give me more pleasure, but I hardly think I can. My affairs are so unsettled as yet. Until this matter of my inheritance is arranged satisfactorily I shall feel like a kind of outcast. Beeching Hollow is my home, but as long as it is controlled by my faithless guardian I never can expect to return there. I don't believe my life would be safe there."

"It is terrible to think how you are situated, Clif," she replied, in a sympathetic tone. "But don't be downhearted. Father will stick by you and see that you are righted. There are bright days ahead of you."

"I hope so. The brightest, however, will be those in which you have a part. In the short time I have known you I have learned to care a great deal for you, and I know I shall keep right on caring more for you every day, unless—you tell me not to. And even then—but I've no right to talk to you this way. I might offend you, and—"

"No, no, you will never offend me, Clif," she said earnestly. "Then you do care a little for me, do you, Florence?"

"Yes."

"How much?"

"Very much indeed."

"If I thought you cared as much for me as I do for you I'd feel very happy indeed—so happy that I wouldn't care whether school kept or not."

Florence averted her face and made no reply.

At that moment Walter sang out:

"There's your ranch yonder, I guess, Clif."

Both Clif and Florence bent forward and looked toward the foothills where the moonlight shone down on a rambling two-story building with several outhouses around it.

They could see the snake fence stretching in two directions, and a white streak bordered by trees leading up from what appeared to be the main gate.

There were bigger ranches on either side of it, with lights in the windows of the houses, but the Price ranch looked dark, and gloomy, and uninviting.

They drove up to the gate, the boys got down and opened it and closed it again when Mr. Cowell drove the wagon into the white lane.

Then they rode up to the house.

The doors were all locked and they had no key with which to enter, but this difficulty was overcome by forcing one of the kitchen windows.

They had brought three lamps with them and a supply of oil, and soon had a light to view their surroundings.

The house was completely furnished, just as the original owner had turned it over to Mr. Price at the time of the sale, but everything was covered with the dust of two years' unoccupancy.

Clif was surprised to find things in such good shape.

He had been more than half afraid that they would only find a wreck.

Florence found a broom and gave the living room a rough sweeping, while her father and the boys broke into the barn, put the horses in the stalls and watered and fed them.

The wagon was then pushed into the building and the door secured again temporarily.

They had brought four single mattresses with them, with a sufficiency of sheets and a light blanket apiece.

These they carried into the house and placed in the rooms assigned to Florence, Mr. Cowell and the two boys, after the windows had been opened and the rooms well aired.

They only removed enough of the dust to answer their purposes for the night, intending to put the house in order next day.

Finally they bade one another good-night, the lights were soon afterward extinguished, and but for the open windows the building looked as it had looked from the outside for two years past.

CHAPTER XVI.

HOW THE CHASE ENDED—CONCLUSION.

Clif found it an uncommonly hard matter to get asleep that night, while Walter, on the contrary, dropped off at once.

After rolling first on one side and then on the other, in a vain attempt to woo unconsciousness, he finally got up and leaned out of the window.

The air was warm and still, while the night was a perfect one.

Sound travels far under such conditions.

Before he had been at the window a minute he heard the sound of men's voices around the corner of the house.

He listened attentively, and it struck him that there was a familiar ring in the tones of one of the intruders.

Instantly it occurred to him that the nocturnal visitors were Mr. Fleming and his associate, Monkton.

Had they recognized him and Walter in Tucson and followed the party out to the ranch, or were they already on the ground when Clif and his companions arrived?

That's the way the boy put it to himself, but he had no means of knowing which of the two ideas was the correct one.

However, they were on hand now past all doubt, and the question that agitated Clif's mind was what game were they up to, and how should he deal with them?

Presently four men appeared from around the corner of the house, and Clif drew his head in to prevent being seen.

It was well he did so, for they looked up at the open window and stopped right beneath it.

"We'd better make an entrance by this window," said Fleming.

"I think it would be much easier to force one of the kitchen windows," answered Monkton.

"The noise might arouse them. When I was here before, two years ago, there was a ladder lying in the grass back of the barn. If it is there still it will serve our purpose first rate."

"All right," replied his associate. "Jenkins, you and Patterson go to the back of the barn and see if there's a ladder on the ground. If there is, bring it here."

The two tough-looking rascals started off to carry this order into execution.

"We must be cautious," said Mr. Fleming. "The boys may not be in the room above, but in an adjoining one. We mustn't awake either the gentleman or his daughter."

"No, nor the boys, either, if we can help it," said Monkton. "The easiest way is always the best. Still, we've got to get possession of that pocketbook at all hazards. Once it is in our hands the game is as good as won, as far as the mine is concerned, and that is all that interests me. As for yourself, the boy being a standing menace to you, the three of us are willing to help you put him out of the way if you say the word. I've got a phial of chloroform in my pocket. A handkerchief well soaked with it and pressed over his nostrils for a few minutes will end his earthly account without a struggle. In the morning it will be supposed that he died in his sleep of heart failure, or something of that sort."

"Dare you murder him?" hoarsely whispered Mr. Fleming.

"I dare, all right; but I'm not going to. It's not my funeral, but yours. I have done my share in fetching the means and offering the suggestion; it is up to you to carry it out."

"Isn't there some other way of dealing with the boy?"

"None quite as effective, or more merciful. We could, of course, drug and carry him off to some hole in the hills, where we could leave him gagged and bound to starve to death. But why put the lad in misery when an easy death can be handed out to him?"

"I would rather not kill him at all," objected Mr. Fleming.

"That's where you're a fool, Fleming. The boy has probably acquainted this tourist with the facts of his case, and secured his help by offering him an interest in the mine. Besides, we have good reason to believe that he may have confided a knowledge of your plot to Lawyer Goodrich. Your son caught him listening to our conversation under the sitting-room window that night, and, unfortunately, took him for a ghost. You can't possibly let him live and hope to win out. With the documents in your possession, and the boy dead, you will have plain sailing. Otherwise, you ought to know what you may expect to be up against."

At that moment the two men returned with the ladder. "Here's the ladder now," added Monkton. "I'll go up first." Clif had heard every word with the greatest distinctness. He saw that his case was desperate.

His life as well as the contents of the pocketbook he was supposed to carry with him was in jeopardy.

Well, he was prepared to defend himself, even if he had to shoot to kill to do it.

"He didn't want anybody's blood on his hands, least of all his guardian's, but if Mr. Fleming forced the issue himself he didn't think he would be responsible for what happened.

Placing his hand over Walter's mouth, he aroused him.

"Hush!" he whispered in his chum's ear.

"What's the matter?" asked Walter, springing up.

"My enemies are under the window with a ladder and are about to enter the house. They have two other men with them, and it is evident that they mean business. Where's your revolver?"

"In my jacket pocket."

"Get it out. We must not let them get a foothold in the room. Monkton has suggested that I be chloroformed out of the world, and I fear Mr. Fleming has been persuaded to carry the idea out. We must wing these rascals when they appear, and put it out of their power to do us further injury while we're here on the ranch."

Clif's sharp eyes saw the top of the ladder drop against the window-sill at that moment.

There was no time to be lost, and he drew his chum back into the shadows.

Presently Monkton's head appeared at the window.

After pausing a moment and looking in, he motioned to Fleming behind and stepped softly into the room.

Fleming now showed in the opening and placed his leg across the sill.

"Now," whispered Clif in his companion's ear. "Shoot Monkton in the leg and I will do the same with Mr. Fleming. Fire!"

Almost simultaneously the two revolvers awoke the echoes of the room and house.

Monkton uttered a cry of agony, staggered a few steps and fell flat on the floor.

Singleton had not made sufficient allowance for the kick of his weapon, and the bullet instead of striking the man's thigh, as Walter intended, penetrated his abdomen and inflicted a mortal wound.

Clif's ball, on the contrary, had gone unerringly into Fleming's extended thigh, broken the bone, and rendered him hors de combat on the window-sill.

The two rascals outside, alarmed by the shots and the cries of their two employers, stood for a few moments undecided, and then scooted out of sight around the house, making for the spot where the four horses were tied to a fence.

Of course, the shots had aroused both Mr. Cowell and his daughter from their sleep, and while the latter lay and trembled with alarm, the former rushed at once into the boys' room, and found Clif and Walter helping the wounded Fleming through the window into the room, where they laid him on the nearest mattress, for he was suffering great pain.

Monkton was unconscious.

The lamp was lighted and then Clif made a hasty explanation of the circumstances, repeating as near as he could remember the conversation he had overheard between Mr. Fleming and Monkton.

"This man looks as if he had been hard hit," said Mr. Cowell, pointing to the unconscious Monkton. "Which of you fired at him?"

"I did," replied Walter, promptly. "He's hit in the leg, isn't he?"

"I'm afraid he's shot in a more vital spot."

"I aimed at his thigh," answered Singleton.

After an examination of the man, Mr. Cowell shook his head.

"He's hit in a bad spot and is bleeding internally," he said.

They laid him on the other mattress, which they removed to the other side of the room.

Mr. Cowell and the boys dressed themselves, and then the former went downstairs and got a flask of brandy.

This stimulant brought Monkton to his senses.

With the intuition of a mortally wounded man he seemed to realize that his course on earth was about run.

Clif grasped the chance to persuade him to make a full confession of his iniquity against Grantley Price and himself.

"How about Fleming?" he asked weakly. "Did he escape?"

"No. He has a broken leg and is our prisoner."

"What do you think of my chances?" he asked Mr. Cowell.

"The ball is in your abdomen and you are bleeding inwardly. There isn't a chance in a thousand for you to recover. If you have anything to say you will have to be quick about it, for I see that you are sinking fast."

"It's tough to have to die in the full flush of health," replied Monkton. "Who shot me? You, Clifford Price?"

"No. I fired at Mr. Fleming."

"Well, perhaps I'll stand a better chance in the next world by making a clean breast of everything," he said slowly and thoughtfully. "Put your hand in the pocket of my coat, young man. You will find there your father's original will. The one filed by Fleming in Macedonia is a forgery. Now take down what I tell you."

Mr. Cowell produced a pocket fountain pen and a memorandum book.

Monkton then confessed the whole conspiracy to defraud Clif, and stated what his share in the transaction had been.

He signed the book with an unsteady hand, and the others signed it as witnesses.

"I think I feel better after that," he said. "Do you forgive me, boy?"

"I do, with all my heart," replied Clif, solemnly.

Monkton lingered till daylight and then died.

In the meantime Mr. Fleming was made as comfortable as possible.

Clif showed him Monkton's confession, and he saw that the game was up for good and all.

"I suppose you mean to prosecute me," he said, despondently.

"No, Mr. Fleming, not if you will add your confession to Monkton's. In that event you may go where you choose and take your son. If you do not prosper in three years send me your address and I will forward you a sum of money to give you another start. I think I am treating you fairly."

Mr. Fleming admitted it and made a statement covering everything.

Next day Mr. Fleming and the body of Monkton were moved to Tucson.

During the week Mr. Cowell and the boys located the turquoise mine, but it was decided not to disturb it until Clif reached twenty-one and came into full possession of all his property.

Clif did not accompany Florence Cowell and her father to California, but returned with his chum to Macedonia to start the necessary legal proceedings that would establish his unquestioned right to his father's property.

In due time Mr. Stapleton was appointed his guardian, and the Stapleton family removed to Beeching Hollow at Clif's request.

Clif decided not to go to a big college, but engage a private tutor for himself and Walter.

His education was practically completed to suit his own ideas when he reached his twenty-first birthday.

Then he and Walter went to Arizona and opened up the turquoise mine.

After taking out many thousand dollars worth of rough stones, Clif finally sold the ranch and mine to a corporation for a million dollars.

On his return East there were great doings at Beeching Hollow.

He and Walter had stopped over at Chicago, and when they left for Macedonia, Florence Cowell accompanied them as Clif's wife.

There was something of a celebration at the Hollow to welcome its new mistress, with music and fireworks galore.

Then the two young people settled down to a life of quiet wedded bliss.

To-day their children are never tired of hearing about the Chase for a Fortune.

Next week's issue will contain "JUGGLING WITH THE MARKET; OR, THE BOY WHO MADE IT PAY."

SEND POSTAL FOR OUR FREE CATALOGUE.

CURRENT NEWS

Warden Sale of the North Carolina Penitentiary died of apoplexy after he had superintended the electrocution of two negroes. The warden appeared agitated as he unstrapped the bodies of the men from the electric chair and shortly afterward became unconscious. He was dead when physicians reached him. The doctors said that nervous strain incident to the double execution undoubtedly caused his death.

As a result of feeding fires under boilers operating at 175 per cent. rating, the firemen of a Middle West electric power plant suffered from blisters on the exposed parts of their bodies. The company solved the difficulty by providing the firemen with long-handled, square-ended coal shovels which, while not impairing the dexterity with which the toilers fed the fire, saved the men from the intense heat.

Almand Vade-Boucoeur, of Woonsocket, R. I., is dead and Henry Cassavant is dangerously ill after eating cream puffs supposed to have been poisoned and sent through the mails to Cassavant. The package was addressed in a woman's writing and postmarks show it was mailed here. Although Cassavant ate two of the three puffs in the package and Vade-Boucoeur ate only one, the latter died soon after a physician was called, while his friend may recover.

By a unanimous vote, the stockholders of the Baltimore Federal League Club empowered the board of directors of the organization to raise $50,000 for the purpose of pressing the so-called anti-trust suit before Judge K. M. Landis in Chicago and to set in motion any other litigation looking toward the securing of the rights of the local owners. The same vote carried with it the power for the directors to sell or otherwise dispose of the leasehold estate of the corporation in the ball park at York Road and Twenty-ninth street.

Andrew Schimmer, sixty-five years old, of No. 272 Lorimer street, Williamsburg, N. Y., drew $1,000 from the German Savings Bank and started toward his home. Only a few steps from the bank two men greeted him. "I've been looking all over for you," exclaimed one. "I have $10,000 to put away and want you to recommend a good bank." Schimmer not only recommended the bank he had just left, but volunteered to take the $10,000 there and leave his $1,000 with his supposed friends. He did. When he returned both "friends" and the $1,000 were gone. The "$10,000" was mostly blank paper with a couple of $1 bills on the outside of the roll.

After rendering the Government eighteen years of service the naval collier Justin has been sold at a profit of about $70,000. The collier was purchased during the Spanish-American war for $145,000 and was sold by the Government for $216,600. The most remarkable feature of the sale is that the ship cannot be used in coastwise trade, as she was foreign built. As a collier for the navy the Justin passed her days of usefulness some years ago. It is understood that the Secretary of the Navy may offer some of the other older colliers for sale in the near future. Repairs, changes and additions to the Justin up to June 30, 1915, cost Uncle Sam $308,208.37.

One of the most remarkable geological freaks in Mexico is a mountain situated on the outskirts of Pachuca which represents the appearance at a distance of being covered with spikes. The sides of the mountain are closely studded with stone columns or palisades. These columns are five to twelve feet long and as large around as an average man's body. It is a remarkable uplift of nature, which has the appearance, however, of being the handiwork of human beings. One side of the mountain is almost perpendicular and the stone columns protrude from the surface at right angles, forming an impressive picture. The stone is as hard as flint and has withstood the elements for ages. The spikes form a natural battlement that makes the mountain appear from a distance like some ancient fort.

While the winding of one's watch would seem to call for but a small amount of energy, it assumes a most significant aspect when multiplied several hundred times, as in the instance of a watch repairing concern in New York City, part of whose work it is to wind 700 watches or more each day. To facilitate the work the firm makes use of an electric motor which drives a small, felt-lined socket through friction drive. It is only necessary to start up the motor and hold the stem of a watch against the felt-lined socket to wind the timepiece. When the watch is completely wound, the tightened spring overcomes the pressure between the motor pulley and the friction disk, with the result that slippage takes place. Simple as this electric watch-winding equipment is, it has replaced several men formerly required for the work.

A New England chemist has succeeded in solidifying naphtha on a commercial scale, and is putting it on the market in compression-top cans, as a household commodity. The naphtha, which is solidified by a process analogous to saponification, has much the same appearance as vaseline, and is of about the same consistency. It is claimed that it has many virtues which are foreign to the liquid hydro-carbon, chief among them being its solubility in water, which, combined with the fact that it has all of the grease-removing qualities of liquid naphtha, renders it a highly efficacious article when used in the laundry. Used undiluted, it is said to be ideal for taking spots out of clothes, cleaning and polishing furniture, automobile bodies, etc. It burns readily, but, not being highly volatile, will not explode under ordinary conditions.

MAX AND HIS MILLION

— OR —

WORKING FOR THE WIZARD OF WALL STREET

By ED KING

(A SERIAL STORY)

CHAPTER VI (continued)

Money was just rolling in.

He accepted Ebstein's greenbacks as though they were his by right, as indeed they well might have been, and gave the quotations on Northwest.

Max placed five tips before ten o'clock, two for ten dollars cash each, three on the "pay-if-you-win" plan.

He thought that would end it, for there was seldom much doing at the Wizard's shop after the opening of the Stock Exchange.

It was different this morning, however.

At eleven the door opened, and a stately, pompous man walked in.

"I desire to see Mr. Coloney," he said, walking with heavy tread toward the sanctum door.

"I represent Mr. Coloney. He will not be here at present," replied Max. "But I do business for him just the same as if he was here himself. What is it you wish?"

"I—er—I wished to consult him as to the stock market," was the reply, "but you—"

"Your name, sir, if you please!" broke in Max, imitating the Wizard's abrupt way.

The name was given with some reluctance.

Max started.

It was a name which was good for hundreds of millions if rumor was correct.

CHAPTER VII.

MAX AND THE MISER.

"Take a seat, sir, if you please," said Max, closing the door of the sanctum.

The multimillionaire, however, preferred to stand.

Mr. Brown, as we shall call him for the sake of convenience, was not the sort to lower his dignity by sitting down with the office boy, as he took Max to be.

"My business is with Mr. Coloney," he said, pompously. "When will he be in?"

"Mr. Coloney is away," replied Max. "I see him every day, and get his instructions. The only way you can do business with him is through me."

"Is it, indeed?" replied Brown. "Well, I don't do business with boys. I was recommended here by Mr. Hutchings, the broker. He said that I could consult Mr. Coloney himself."

"And you might have done so last week, sir. The case is as I tell you now. Mr. Hutchings was in yesterday, and got a tip through me. You might ask him how well he was satisfied, sir."

Brown glared and stalked out.

Max made no effort to detain him at all.

Max was trying to copy the Wizard's methods as closely as he could.

As he sat in the sanctum he could not see the outer door, so when he heard a voice call out:

"Ah, Mr. Brown! Good-morning, sir! So you drop in here once in a while, do you?" he could not see who it was who had run into the multimillionaire, but he heard his reply distinctly enough.

"Nonsense, sir! I made a mistake in the office, that is all. I do not know this man Coloney."

"Yes, yes! Just so! Fine day, isn't it?" was the chuckling response. "I made a mistake, too."

He wondered who was to be his next customer, but he did not like to lean forward to see.

Then the outer door slammed, and one of the best-known characters on Wall Street walked in.

It was old Jim Gage, the millionaire, reckoned one of the most stylish and most crooked men on the Street.

He peered in through the door of the sanctum and grinned at Max.

His upper set of false teeth dropped down in his mouth, and he gobbled them up again as he said:

"Coloney not in, eh? Not coming any more, I am told."

"Not for the present, Mr. Gage," replied Max, for the wily old speculator was one of the Wizard's regular customers.

"So I was told. Heard that these days a man has to deal through you."

"I get the prices from Mr. Coloney every night, sir. They are at your service if you wish."

"Why, I would like to get a few tips, young man. You have these prices written down?"

"Yes, sir, by Mr. Coloney himself."

"Oh, indeed. Well, let me see the sheet."

"That isn't exactly my way of doing business, Mr. Gage."

"What, then?"

"Tell me the names of your stocks, and I will tell you what the closing prices will be."

"Oh, that's the way you do it? Why can't I see the whole sheet? What difference does it make?"

"I am acting under orders."

"Well, well, what matter? Let me see the sheet, Max, and I'll give you a quarter for yourself."

Max was furious.

"I can only give you prices on the stocks you name," he coldly said.

"Suppose I name half a dozen—will you charge extra?"

"It will be the same," replied Max, beginning to get hotter under the collar than ever.

Old Jim Gage took out his pencil and pad, and scribbled off the names of a dozen prominent stocks.

Max retired to the other desk, consulted his sheet, and jotted down the quotations after each one.

"All right," said the millionaire, receiving the sheet and taking out his wallet. "I suppose you don't charge as much for this sort of service as you do for the other, Max?"

"Why not?"

"Because to consult the Wizard of Wall Street is one thing, and—"

"And the office boy another. The fee is all the same, Mr. Gage, and, by the way, it is more than it used to be. It is ten dollars now."

"Ten dollars?" gasped the millionaire. "Come, come, that won't do. It is not worth it."

"I heard you tell Mr. Coloney not two weeks ago that his tips had been invaluable to you, Mr. Gage."

"That has nothing to do with it. Here is five dollars, the usual fee. It is all I shall pay."

"You will not pay it here, then," said Max, rising, "and now you won't pay anything. Leave the office, please. Don't come here again."

"Oh, very well. I'm five dollars to the good, then," chuckled old Jim Gage, restoring the bill to his wallet. "You have insulted me, boy. I shall look up Mr. Coloney's address and write to him about this. I shall have you discharged."

As the door closed it was opened again almost on the instant.

"Get out. Keep out!" roared Max, making a rush.

But it wasn't old Jim Gage back again.

There stood Susie Smith, her eyes red with weeping, and her face full of sorrow.

"Why, Max!" she exclaimed. "Is that the way you speak to me?"

"Oh, Susie! I didn't know it was you. I thought it was the old man who just went out!" cried Max. "You must have passed him on the stairs. Come right in. Is—your mother gone at last?"

"She is, Max. She died early this morning. Oh, I don't know what I shall do!"

Poor Susie dropped into a chair and burst out into an uncontrollable fit of weeping.

Max hastened to hang the "wait" card on the door, and then started in to comfort the poor girl the best he could.

He told Susie that her mother was better off, that it had to be, and said just what everybody says under the circumstances, and while he was saying it his mind was busily at work.

"Susie, how are you fixed?" he asked. "What are you going to do about the funeral? Who is to bear the expense?"

Susie drew herself up with true ladylike dignity.

"There is but one thing to do, Max," she said, "and I have come to consult you about the best way of doing it. I haven't a cent nor a friend on earth but you. I shall have to report the case to the charity commissioners, and have mother buried at public expense. I want you to tell me how to go about it."

"No, you won't," said Max. "Look here, Susie."

Max counted out a hundred dollars, and placed it in the poor girl's hand.

"Oh, Max! You mustn't."

"But I will! Take that and give your poor mother a respectable funeral. Don't look at me so. It's all honestly mine, and I can spare it. I have a whole lot to tell you, Susie, but it will keep till later. I am Mr. Coloney's partner now."

It took a good deal of urging to make Susie consent to accept the money, and Max had to tell the whole story.

She had scarcely gone when the door opened and a messenger boy entered with an envelope addressed to Max.

He tore it open, and out dropped five twenty-dollar bills, with a brief note from one of the brokers who had taken the Wizard's tips on the "pay-if-you-win" plan the day before.

It read as follows:

"Max: This is your share. As usual, the Wizard's tip was O. K."

"Upon my word! The more you give the more you get back," muttered Max.

And he spent the rest of the morning wondering if it really was so, for no more customers came in.

CHAPTER VIII.

MAX PUTS A PROPOSITION TO ONE OF THE RICHEST MEN IN NEW YORK.

For the next two months Max Meyers' daily work for the Wizard of Wall Street continued much as has been described.

Each day there was something doing, and by the "pay-if-you-win" plan Max was just coining money.

He cleared up over $2,000 the first month, and business came in greater volume than ever.

The brokers now began to be very civil to Max.

They bowed to him on the street, and said, "Good-morning, Mr. Meyers."

Several of the richest men invited him to their homes; at least a dozen tried to inveigle him on board their yachts, or into automobile excursions, and, as for invitations out to lunch, they came by the score.

Max declined them all.

He had not forgotten the Wizard's second tip. He was determined not to forget it, and he repeated it over to himself a hundred times.

"Beware of dropping the position you now hold. Unless you want to lose your million keep on working for the Wizard of Wall Street."

But Max had not made his million yet.

Max attended Mrs. Smith's funeral, and after it was over he made a serious proposition to Susie.

(To be continued)

ITEMS OF INTEREST

HYMN SAVED A DRUNKARD.

Seven years ago an intoxicated man, after tottering along Teaneck Road, finally fell on the lawn of Justice Henry T. Griggs, of Ridgefield Park, N. J., and would have slept there but for a stream of water that was turned on him. Justice Griggs helped to sober the drunkard, gave him something to eat and then listened to his story of how liquor had ruined him. During the recital a young woman in the justice's home began playing the hymn, "The Beautiful Isle of Somewhere." The wanderer was overcome by the music and left the house showing deep emotion.

The other day an auto stopped in front of Justice Griggs' home and a well-dressed man alighted and asked for the justice. He recalled the incident of seven years ago, spoke of the hymn, and said that he had then and there made up his mind to reform. He said he went to a mission in Harlem, where he was helped and later succeeded in business.

"That little girl's hymn did it," said the caller, who refused to give his name.

BIG HAWSERS.

After laborious attempts to tow the Thessaloniki into port the Greek liner Patris arrived here and her captain reported that three heavy steel hawsers had parted during the effort to save the disabled ship. The lines that parted were 4½-inch hawsers, which means that a strain of thirty-one tons, or 62,000 pounds, had been exerted before the break.

In general towing and lighter ship work a 3-inch steel hawser is the usual line used. This consists of six steel wire strands tightly wound on a central strand of hemp which is soaked in oil, giving a certain pliability. This sort of hawser is also used by some of the steamship lines for permanent moorings. The breaking point of the 3-inch steel line is about twenty-three tons. Its cost is 29 cents a foot.

The largest of steel towing lines is the one 6 inches in circumference, the breaking strain of which is fifty-four tons, or 108,000 pounds. Because of the weight of this line and the difficulty of handling it the 4½-inch hawser is the one mostly used for heavy towing.

In bulk the biggest hawsers used here were those on the Hamburg-American liners Vaterland and Imperator. For permanent moorings these great liners used 24-inch hemp hawsers, besides smaller lines of steel wire and hemp.

ABOUT MACHINE GUNS.

Almost every dispatch from the battle fronts has something to tell about machine guns. Like the submarine, the machine gun in its practical form is an American contribution to the energy of war, although in the case of neither of them was the idea original with the inventor.

The first machine gun that was used effectively in war was the Gatling, named after its inventor, a native of North Carolina. In our Civil War it was thoroughly tested and, although crude in comparison with the modern weapon, proved valuable. In the Franco-German war of 1870 the French used a modification of it that they called the mitrailleuse.

The Hotchkiss and the Gardner guns, improvements on the Gatling, were also American inventions, and were extensively added to the equipment of many European armies. The Nordenfelt was invented by a Dane. The Lewis, which is largely used in aeroplane service, is the work of an American. So, too, is the Maxim, which many regard as the best weapon of the sort. It is the gun used by the British, and it is part of the equipment of the other European armies. A modification of it, of a heavier type, is used in naval warfare. The guns of that kind, known as "pom-poms," fire about 300 rounds a minute of shells that weigh a pound and a quarter each. The ordinary machine guns are of the same caliber as the rifle, in order that the same ammunition may serve for both.

FRENCH DOGS ARE WAR HEROES.

France's war dogs have been doing remarkable work on the battlefields. France has trained about twelve hundred dogs for war work and more dogs are being "finished." Some ambulance dogs are famous. There is Loulou, the gift of the poet, Edmund Rostand, to the French army; Stop of the Fifteenth Army Corps, who has saved scores of lives, and Flora of the Twelfth Alpine Chasseurs, who did linking work for four days, running under a rain of shell. Dogs have not yet been quoted in army orders. When they are, there is one dog that will not be forgotten—Marquis, who, though wounded by shrapnel, kept on his way to a far-off detachment and arrived breathless and panting at his destination, only to die as the dispatch he carried was taken from his neck.

"Three classes of dogs are now being used at the front," O. Bert, secretary of the French Association for Training War Dogs, said to a Paris correspondent. "They are patrol dogs, linking dogs and ambulance dogs. The first-class are always of the sheepdog breed, chiefly from Picardy or Flanders, and noted for their intelligence and sense of smell. Their calm temperament, too, counts. The training of the dog for sentinel and patrol work, when he is always accompanied by soldiers, is simple and speedy. When the dogs selected have been sent to the front it requires only four nights' teaching to make them fit for their work. The chief difficulty is to make them learn not to bark, but only to growl. The training of dogs for linking purposes—that is, for keeping two bodies of soldiers in touch with one another—requires two months. The course for an ambulance dog is nearly a year. The ambulance dog, unlike the patrol or linking dog, must be taught to bark so as to give notice to the battlefield searchers when he has found a wounded man."

Young Fresh from 'Frisco

— OR —

THE BOY WHO BOSSSED THE MINE

By GASTON GARNE

(A SERIAL STORY)

CHAPTER XXIII (continued)

He offered to go himself, but Arthur saw that he was in no condition to do so, and, advising him to get to bed as quickly as possible, he picked out nine men whom he felt that he could rely upon, and they proceeded to mount.

Among them were Bill Smith and Tim Nolan, the two men whose lives Jack had saved by his brave descent into shaft No. 2.

Daisy had a horse of her own which she left in the woods, and she followed the party as they went dashing toward the hidden mine.

* * * * *

Without knowledge of the plans on foot to help him, or even a thought of rescue, Jack had taken matters into his own hands in his usual style.

"Throw down your revolver, Tim Brown," he said, calmly, as the foreman stood hesitating.

Tim drew out the revolver and tossed it on the table.

"Now get a move on you!" ordered Jack.

Tim stalked out of the hut.

The moon was shining brightly, and Jack could see that the hut was one of those belonging to the Lucky Strike mine.

The mill was near by, and the machinery was running.

Jack's fear was that Tim would call for help, and he warned him against doing so, the answer being a surly growl.

Now that he was disarmed, Tim proved himself a coward.

Before they had gone very far he began to whine and beg Jack to let up on him.

"I kin tell you all that's been going on at High Rock mine if you'll only stand in with me," he kept saying. "You have got to catch on before you can do business—you know you have."

"I think I have already caught on pretty well," was Jack's reply, "and I have no use for informers—never had."

"No; but this here's a special case," persisted Tim. "You may think you know it all, but you don't, not by a jugful. I'm not so stuck on Tom Barnacle—never was. He's about as mean a proposition as they make. Honestly, I'd sooner tie to you—"

"Trouble is, Tim, I can't trust you."

"Well, you may, then. I could tell you something that you had ought to know. Anyhow, only for me you wouldn't be alive now, and that's right, too. I don't know why you should be so hard on me."

"I don't know how you figure that out."

"I'll tell you. Steinmetz was all for killing you, but I kicked."

"Nonsense! It was you who threw the rope about my neck and nearly hung me."

"Oh, the hanging part was an accident. In fact, the whole business was an accident. I didn't mean to set off that blast. When I found she had gone and the shaft was full of gas there was nothing to do but to light out through Tom Barnacle's secret drift. I made sure you would follow me up, so I laid for you—that's all. You had better stand in with me, Young—I mean Mr. Winton. Honest Injun, it's the best thing you can do."

Jack was thinking hard all the time.

Perhaps, after all, it might be worth his while to change his tune and listen to this man, he said to himself.

There seemed to be some reason for Tim's anxiety to make a bargain which as yet he could not understand.

"How do you want me to stand in with you?" he asked. "What do you expect me to do?"

"Boss, it's hard work to talk to a feller what's behind you. Let's sit down and have a chin."

"No; we will chin this way or not at all."

"Well, if it must be, it must. What if I should put you onto a secret what would be worth a whole lot? Where would I come in, then?"

"Do you mean gold hidden that properly belongs to the mine?" asked Jack, jumping at conclusions.

"Yes; that is just what I mean," said Tim. "Barnacle is a sly one. You may think that him and me and Sam Calaway and Rod Bush and some of the other fellows all stood in together and divided equal, but it's not so. He was absolutely boss. Dr. Dutch will tell you that for the dangerous job he has held for the past five years he has never got anything but high wages. Barnacle made him account for every ounce of gold. Of course, I s'pose he steals some, too, but he had to make returns for every ounce put through the mill. I got my share with the rest, but it was a mighty small one. Barnacle got the biggest end of it every time. He's as mean as mud. He never goes anywhere nor spends a cent. He hasn't got no one belonging to him. Now, what do you suppose he does with it all?"

"I'm waiting for you to tell me, Tim," replied Jack, getting interested now.

"And where do I come in, if I do tell you? Do I get half, boss? I'm giving it to you straight when I say that I have mighty good reason to believe that Tom Barnacle has anywhere from seventy-five to a hundred thousand dollars hidden away at High Rock mine."

"Prove that and you can get one-quarter," replied Jack, quietly.

"And my job—do I keep my job? I don't want to lose it. I'm a good foreman. You might go further for a man to run No. 2, and fare a blame sight worse."

"Yes, you shall keep your job as long as you behave yourself. I tell you, Tim, it is useless for you fellows to fight me. I have telephoned Mr. Sypher just how the case stands here at the mine. If it isn't me for boss it will be some one else, and Barnacle's day is all over in any case. Moreover, the sheriff is on his way to the mine now to back me up. He is bound to catch Barnacle. I know just where to put my finger on him. You might as well come in out of the rain while there's time."

"I'm thinking that same way myself," said Tim, "and I accept your offer. Take me back to the mine and I'll explain."

"You will explain now, or not at all," said Jack, decidedly. "If you don't explain the sheriff takes you, and that's all there is about it. It is up to you, Tim."

"And I get a quarter and hold my job?"

"Yes; I shall keep my word."

Tim stopped and Jack walked up to him.

"Your hand on that, boss," the fellow said.

Jack shook hands.

"Done," said Tim. "Now I trust you. What I know is this: That gold all went into the office and never come out again. Barnacle always locks himself in when Dr. Dutch brings over the returns. It is my opinion that there is some secret hiding-place under the office. I've had my eye peeled this long while, and I think I can show you just where that place is."

"Very well," replied Jack, "and so you shall. We will go there right now."

"Not by the road," added Tim. "I can show you a shorter cut. We can be there in ten minutes' time."

To this Jack agreed also, and Tim struck off over the hill on their left, picking his way among the rocks by the light of the moon.

CHAPTER XXIV.

CONCLUSION.

Now that they had come to an understanding, Tim Brown proved his sincerity in a way that satisfied Jack that he actually was sincere.

He started right in to talk freely.

Every detail of Tom Barnacle's rascality, so far as Tim knew, was made plain during that brief but rapid walk.

If Jack had only known, it would have been better for him to have stuck to the road, for in that case he would have run into Arthur and his party before he had gone much further.

As it was he missed them, and about fifteen minutes later he and Tim arrived at the mine without having met a soul.

Here all was quiet.

Jack led the way directly to the office, pulled down the shades, lit the lamps and locked the door.

"Now, then, Tim, what do you know?" he exclaimed. "Prove your claim and hold yourself straight, and you will find that you have a friend in me."

"I know that it is here somewhere that he hides it," declared Tim. "I have seen many a box of bullion bars come in here, and I know what we got. I tell you, boss, as I said before, Tom Barnacle is a regular miser. That gold is hid here somewhere, surest thing."

"We must examine the walls and every inch of the floor space," declared Jack. "I will begin in this corner here, and you take the other. Now is the time to do it when there is little chance of our being disturbed."

A good hour's work followed, but it brought no results.

The office furniture was pushed about, the floors and walls sounded, but nothing came of it.

Tim was in despair.

"I know you think I have been lying to you, boss," he said, "but it hain't so. Every word I have told you is gospel truth, and I believe the gold is here."

"There is one piece of floor we haven't examined yet," said Jack. "It is rather stupid of us not to have thought of it, too."

"Where is that?" asked Tim.

"It was the little hallway at the foot of the stairs."

The outer door did not lead directly into the office. Jack stepped out into the hall now.

"Bring the lamp, Tim," he said, "and place it on the stairs. We will do a little sounding here."

And this was the time that they struck it.

Almost with the first move he made Jack found the loose board.

It was so arranged that it could be pushed in under the stairs, and the one alongside of it could be moved in the same way.

This left an opening big enough to admit a man.

Jack took the lamp and flashed it down.

There was a short ladder here leading down into a vault which had been hollowed out under the office.

"Get down, Tim, and report what you find!" cried Jack, not fully trusting the fellow yet, and he set the lamp on the floor.

Tim was not a second in obeying the orders.

"There!" he exclaimed. "By thunder, boss, it's great! Come down and take a look. There is gold here to beat the band."

The words were scarcely spoken when some one tried the outer door.

Tried it first, and sent it crashing in one instant later.

There stood Tom Barnacle, Sam Calaway and the man Rod Bush, who had attempted Jack's life on the mountain trail.

"So so, Young Fresh! You are still at your tricks!" sneered Barnacle. "Prying into secrets which don't concern you, I see. Go down into that hole."

(To be continued)

TIMELY TOPICS

John St. John, Jr., a boy of ten years, living on the Cedar Point road, north of Curtice, Ohio, caught a pure-white muskrat with pink eyes recently while hunting.

The Crocker land expedition, under Donald B. MacMillan, is spending another winter in the Arctic. The steamer "George B. Cluett," which went North last autumn to bring the explorers back, is icebound in North Star Bay, about 120 miles from the expedition's base at Etah, Greenland. Letters received by way of Copenhagen reported all hands well and preparing for a renewed campaign of explorations during the winter and spring.

The sight of nearly 16,000 bushels of ear corn piled on the ground awaiting shipment in a small country town is somewhat unusual, but this is what one beholds on a side street near the elevator in Agenda, Kan. The condition is caused by the car shortage, from which this and other towns are suffering. Notwithstanding this, farmers continue to haul in load after load—there being times when the streets are blocked with corn wagons and teams waiting their turn to get on the scales.

The U.S.S. Oregon, which, until Dec. 1, had been on duty at the San Francisco Exposition, and since that time has been at San Diego, has been ordered turned over to the Naval Militia of California. Orders have been issued transferring the marine detachment of that vessel to the marine barracks, San Diego, Cal., and it will remain there as a separate organization. It has been designated as the 29th Company and will be trained as the signal company of the expeditionary force on the West coast.

Japan's naval programme as outlined before the Diet on Jan. 8 by Vice-Admiral Kato, Minister of the Navy, provides for eight superdreadnoughts within the next three years. It is also planned to construct four battle cruisers and this number will be doubled if the finances of the country will permit. The auxiliary fleet will be greatly increased. Since the beginning of the war four battle cruisers have been finished and four superdreadnoughts nearly finished. The Fuso has had her trial runs. The Gamashiro is to be launched shortly, and the Hyuga and Ise are to follow within a few months. The general belief is that Admiral Kato has only made public a part of the plans.

Meteors, or shooting stars, are small solid bodies that fall through space, become incandescent in the atmosphere of the earth, and usually disappear in the form of gas or dust. If two observers stationed several miles apart see the same shooting star and note the point in the sky where it appeared they can construct a hypothetical triangle, the apex of which is the point of appearance of the meteor, and thus obtain the approximate height of the shooting star when it first became visible. For a long period of years, it appears, a German observer employed this method of estimating the height of shooting stars. From careful observations of no less than 102 meteors he found that the mean height at which shooting stars first become visible is eighty-one miles. The mean height of the point at which they disappear is about fifty-nine miles, and the average length of their visible path forty-five miles.

As a result of the war, the United States has entered into a new industry, namely, the manufacture of quartz glass. Heretofore this product has been manufactured in Germany and imported into this country in large quantities, despite the high tariff. Curiously enough, the glass has always been made from a peculiar kind of sand which is found only in Nebraska. Thousands of tons of this sand in the past have been shipped to German glass factories and returned to the United States in the form of finished glassware, such as crucibles, test tubes, retorts and other similar articles employed in chemical laboratories. So great was the demand for quartz glass in this country that previous to the war it was found advisable and even profitable to mine the sand in Nebraska, transport it in bulk to Atlantic seaports and across the ocean to Germany and, after the glassware had been manufactured, to return it in the finished form to American markets. The advantages accruing from the new industry are too obvious to be mentioned.

Harry Davis, a fourteen-year-old boy, had a fierce fight with a young Rocky Mountain bald eagle on Puerto Suello Hill, East San Rafael, Cal. The boy was out hunting squirrels with a party of boys, and while walking along a rocky point he noticed three large birds engaged in a fierce battle. He finally ascertained that two of the birds were chicken hawks and the large bird was an eagle. After the eagle had finally beat his adversaries until they retired from the field, the exhausted bird alighted on a rock near the young nimrod. A shot from his rifle wounded the bird and it flew to the top of a large pine tree. In his excitement Davis scrambled up the tree in search of his prize. At a point fifty feet from the ground the young hunter attacked the wounded eagle with a small branch of a tree. The eagle resented the attack and made vicious lunges at him. With one stroke of its claw it almost tore the boy's coat from his back. But young Davis was game and fought the bird at the risk of his own life. The bird succeeded in getting below the boy and thus holding him prisoner in his lofty perch. Finally one of his boy companions carried his gun to within reaching distance, with the result that a well-directed bullet settled the question of supremacy between the eagle and the young hunter. The boy, who escaped with a few bruises, brought the eagle to San Rafael, where it was measured and found to reach five feet six inches from tip to tip. This is the first eagle that has been seen or killed in this vicinity for many years.

Fame and Fortune Weekly

NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 25, 1916.

TERMS TO SUBSCRIBERS

Single Copies.....	.05 Cents
One Copy Three Months.....	.65 Cents
One Copy Six Months.....	1.25
One Copy One Year.....	2.50

Postage Free

HOW TO SEND MONEY—At our risk send P. O. Money Order, Check or Registered Letter; remittances in any other way are at your risk. We accept Postage Stamps the same as cash. When sending silver wrap the Coin in a separate piece of paper to avoid cutting the envelope. Write your name and address plainly. Address letters to

HARRY E. WOLFF, President
N. HASTINGS WOLFF, Treasurer
CHARLES E. NYLANDER, Secretary

Frank Tousey, Publisher
168 West 23d St., N. Y.

GOOD CURRENT NEWS ARTICLES

While watching Robert Hine cut holes in the ice on Pewaukee Lake, Wis., Carl Zinn, of Milwaukee, who, with friends, was spending the day at the Zinn summer home, jerked a handkerchief from his pocket. A pocketbook containing $150 in bills and other valuable papers, which were in the pocket, fell into the hole.

It is sometimes found inconvenient to carry a flask. This will hereafter be unnecessary, thanks to a Parisian chemist, who has discovered a process for solidifying liquors such as brandy, whisky, etc., and converting them into tablets. You can thus eat your stimulants—or dissolve them at pleasure.

Since the acquisition of Alaska by the United States the waters in and contiguous to the Territory have yielded fishery products having a first value of more than a quarter of a billion dollars. Far exceeding all the other products in importance are the salmon, after which come the fur seal, the sea otter, the halibut and the cod.

In large manufacturing establishments buttons on shoes and on garments are no longer sewed on by hand. The work is done by a machine capable of sewing fifty-three hundred buttons on garments in nine hours. This is equal to the work of about eight expert sewers. A boy or girl can run the machine.

Interesting experiments that have been made with bullets pointed at both ends seem to indicate that that is the real form of projectile, so far as the bullet itself is concerned, says an article in Outing for February. The difficulty lies in the changes which this form would necessitate in the structure of the cartridge. The present flat-ended bullet drags air after it in the same way that a chopped-off barge drags water, and this cannot fail to have an upsetting tendency which can only be offset by an excessive spin. The present bullet also travels light end first, which is contrary to the physical laws governing stability. It will be interesting to see whether the present demand for the very best thing possible in ammunition will not lead to some practical adoption of a bullet tapered at both ends.

Michael Tuholksi, a steel mill puddler from Cleveland, Ohio, aged 22 years, was rejected at the United States Marine Corps recruiting station, in Pittsburgh, Pa., as "too big and husky" for the Marine Corps. Tuholksi measured 6 feet 5 inches in his stocking feet and weighed 257 pounds without clothing. The medical examiner pronounced him a perfect physical specimen, but the maximum height for marines is 73 inches and no giants or pygmies are wanted in the Marine Corps, according to Sergeant Michael De Boo, who is in charge of the local recruiting station for sea soldiers. The giant recruit, who says he is no white hope, and has no desire to meet Jess Willard or Frank Moran, will resume puddling in the mills, he told De Boo when the latter rejected him.

GRINS AND CHUCKLES

Freddie—What's the difference between being sick and an invalid? Cobwigger—An invalid, my boy, is one who makes those around him sick.

"You say he is a financial wreck. Then why is it that he appears so happy?" "Well, I guess his credit's so poor that he can't even borrow trouble."

Nozey—I see they've revived the rumor that General Kitchener is to be married. Henpeck—That wouldn't be surprising. It's natural for him to want to know something about every form of warfare.

A Gotham fire was lately reported to be caused by the "spontaneous combustion of sausages." Of all bad stories of fires this is probably one of the wurst.

"So you think your country will be lost?" "I haven't quite made up my mind," answered the King of Corea, "whether it is going to be lost, strayed or stolen."

"Stand up, McNutty," said the police magistrate. "Are you guilty or not guilty?" "Faith, an' meself as can't tell thot till Oi hear th' evidence," replied McNutty.

Cholly Chumpleigh—No; the woman I marry must be of fine intellect. Miss Caustique—I should think you'd rather have a wife who would think you a great man.

Friend—Your new heavy villain seems adapted to the role. Theatrical Manager—Yes. He can pronounce the word "revenge" with fourteen r's, and look it with thirty.

"Willie," said his mother on her return from a shopping expedition, "I told you if you were good while I was out, you might have a piece of candy, and now I find you've taken all there was in the box." "Yes, mamma," replied Willie, "but you've no idea how very good I've been."

An instructor in one of the colored schools in Mobile asked her pupils one day who Nero was. A little darky held up his hand. "Do you, Arthur, know who Nero was?" "Yessum, he's the one we sing about in our Sunday-school." "What is the song like?" "Nero, my God, to Thee."

THE BEGGAR BRAVO.

By Paul Braddon

The great disgrace of Naples was the pest of beggary.

Among the crowd of beggars which were watching for our party every time we emerged from the doors of the Hotel de Russe, I had especially observed one fellow, whose contracted limb involved the necessity of a crutch, though otherwise he hobbled about with great dexterity.

It was a bright, pleasant day which we had selected for our first visit to Pompeii, that greatest curiosity in Italy, and, perhaps, in the entire world.

We dashed off in our open vehicle. On we sped toward Pompeii through the streets of Portici, of Resina—a modern town built on the surface of buried Herculaneum—of Torre del Annunziata, until at length we reached the gates of the city.

We wandered four hours among the exhumed houses and streets. We had separated accidentally from our party—a lady friend and myself—and had lost ourselves in the lonely labyrinths of the strangely interesting place, when suddenly my companion said, pointing to an approaching figure:

"Here is a modern visitor to vary the scene."

"Ay, but who would have thought to see a beggar here in these lonely streets? And, as I live," continued I, "one whom I have met before. It is one of the well-known street beggars whom we see daily. Don't you remember the chap with the crutch?"

"A lira, for charity's sake, signor," he said, as he hobbled closer toward us, at the same time looking furtively in all directions.

"What brings you here?" I asked, by no means liking the expression upon his countenance. "I have seen you too often already in town."

"Only a lira," he continued, managing to get almost between the lady and myself.

At the same moment, dropping his crutch and assuming an upright posture, he drew a long knife suddenly from his breast and, raising it in a threatening manner, demanded:

"Quick! Your watch and purse, or I strike!"

The lady shrank back and hid her face.

But I knew the dangers besetting travelers in the environs of Naples too well not to have taken reasonable precautions for self-protection, and instantly drawing a small revolver from my pocket I cocked it and aimed at his head.

"You scoundrel!" I exclaimed, "if you so much as move a finger, I'll blow your brains out where you stand."

The fellow trembled visibly, while his eyes rested on the muzzle of the revolver.

"Drop that knife—drop it instantly," I exclaimed, "or I fire!"

"Oh, signor, I did but jest."

"Quick," I repeated, "or your life is forfeited."

The man hesitated for one instant, glanced about him to see what possible means of escape there might be, then into my face, where he must have seen that I meant what I said, for it was with the utmost difficulty that I refrained from shooting him.

The knife fell to the ground.

Still covering him with the pistol, my first impulse was to arrest him and tie his hands.

But I knew that he might, by some lucky chance, turn the tables upon me while I was thus engaged.

Besides, I remembered my companion lay in a fainting condition on the ground, where she had sunk in terror at the scene which was occurring so near to her.

As I had identified the rascal, I thought it would be easy to have him arrested if desirable on our return to the city.

All these thoughts passed through my brain with the rapidity of lightning, and so, having made up my mind, I suddenly shouted in his ears:

"Now run for your life, or I'll fire!"

The man looked down at the knife, and at the crutch, which also lay upon the ground, as though he would seize them if he dared to do so, and then started and ran down one of the lanes which intersected the broader street where we stood, and I was left alone with my former companion.

After partly reassuring her, we started off to find the rest of our party, who were not discovered until we reached the entrance gate, and where they had been for some time awaiting our appearance.

To the military guard at the gate I related my adventure, and was informed that this was the second time during that month that a similar occurrence had taken place, and that I had been more fortunate than the party in the other instance, as a robbery was at that time consummated, doubtless by this same rascal.

"Leave the knife and crutch with us," said the officer. "They may lead to the discovery of the fellow."

Of course our adventure served as a subject for conversation on the drive back to Naples, but was quite forgotten thereafter in our busy life of sight-seeing.

One pleasant morning, however, we were honored by a call from an individual who wore the civil uniform of a Government officer, and were told that our presence would be required at the courthouse on the morrow, as well as that of our lady friend who had witnessed the assault committed in the street of the exhumed city.

Here was trouble at once; the lady refused flatly to go to court, and "make a spectacle of herself."

But how to avoid it? That was the question.

Her brother, who was of our party, soon solved the matter, took his sister on board the steamer, and sailed that evening for Leghorn, whence he took rail to Rome, where we agreed to meet each other within a week or ten days.

It was only anticipating their proposed departure by about twenty-four hours.

Justice, both in France and Italy, is a tedious and expensive process, when a foreigner brings a suit for any purpose, but when the agents of the Government take the matter in hand, and conduct it on their own account, there is a most commendable celerity of action.

In this instance the Government were especially aroused and in earnest, owing to the boldness of the robberies lately committed in and about the city, whereby national interference had been provoked, on the part of more than one foreign Government whose citizens had been plundered and in some instances imprisoned by banditti, and held for ransom in heavy sums until they were satisfied, while the culprits eluded all efforts of the authorities to discover and punish them.

I sat in the courtroom, conversing with the very intelligent officer who had conducted me hither, and from whom I learned that the disguised beggar, who had so often attracted my attention in front of the Hotel de Russe, had been discovered to be one of a very dangerous gang, to whose charge many robberies were traced.

It appeared that the plan of action was for him to assume the character of a street beggar, and to hang about the principal hotels where strangers were to be met, and by various means to learn of their proposed excursions, thus to plan their robbery by meeting them outside the city limits.

He had undoubtedly known of our proposed visit to Pompeii, and had watched our party until, as is almost sure to be the case, some one or more should stroll away from the rest, and thus become an easy victim to an armed and desperate man.

"We have him hard and fast, however, this time," continued the official, as he described the fellow's mode of operating.

He walked to the open window overlooking the jail-yard while he spoke, and beckoned to me.

"There comes our prisoner, followed by those two musketeers. Do you recognize the man who attacked you?" he asked.

"Perfectly. I should know him in almost any disguise," said I, at the same moment observing a singular commotion in the yard.

The prisoner's hands were bound by a rope, when, suddenly, by an almost superhuman exertion of strength, he wrenched them apart, and, seeing the yard gate open, dashed through it into the street beyond.

The two guards ran to the entrance; both aimed and fired at the fleeing culprit, who dropped first on his knees, and then at full length upon the ground; both shots had taken effect in vital parts.

The official and myself hastened into the street, but before we reached the body the bravo had ceased to breathe.

POSTMARK COLLECTING.

Nine out of every ten boys collect stamps, so that there is no especial distinction in entertaining that hobby. How many, on the other hand, do you suppose, are collectors of postmarks? Probably not one in a thousand. If you save up postmarks you are doing something original—something out of the way.

Postmark collecting is as interesting as stamp gathering, and every whit as difficult. There is no money in the hobby except on rare occasions when a persistent collector wishes to obtain rare postmarks thirty, forty and fifty years old, even if he must buy them.

The best way to start a collection of postmarks is to ask friends for their old envelopes. In so doing many duplicates will soon come into the possession of the owner, and he may exchange them with other collectors of his acquaintance. When expositions and world's fairs are held, special postmarks are used in the cities supporting the fair. In Europe, special war postmarks add to the interest of collectors. There are the war cancellations and censor marks on the envelopes, and also some very unusual military markings.

Among the more unusual postmarks of the present day are the aerial, "naval vessels" and advertising marks. All of these are of special design.

Postmark collecting has been able to boast of a few devotees almost since stamps were first issued in 1842, but only recently has it become established on a basis that could induce serious collectors to take it up. A national postmark collectors' society was recently formed, and the number of its members has been steadily increasing.

When collecting a postmark the gatherer cuts the stamp and postmark out of the envelope so that he has a rectangular slip of paper.

The sizes of the clippings are not standard and vary often according to the position and design of the postmark. Some collectors file their "finds" in an ordinary indexed file, while others put them in blank books, albums or on loose sheets of paper.

As to obliterated and effaced numbers and letters on postmarks, these are usually in the middle or fourth line in both the wavy and straight lines of United States postmarks. They designate the number of the canceling machine. Where there is only one machine in an office, no numbers are used. Sometimes the numbers on postmarks represent a certain employee using the machine, and so act as a sort of check and as a means toward tracing the envelope.

Have you ever noticed a letter on the second line from the bottom? This denotes whether the envelope was picked up from a regular mail box or was dropped in the main office. The former is marked C and the latter with a D. Other letters found on postmarks designate the sources from which the postal employees first receive the envelope.

There are postmarks stamped by hand, and special postmarks on registered mail and parcels post packages.

Harold P. Piser, of Brooklyn, is one of the experts on postmarks, and he can classify and explain any sort of postmark from any sort of place. It has been a fascinating study to pile up all this knowledge about an art that is so little exploited. If you want to be a stamp expert you have many books to go by and you can ask the advice of innumerable collectors. In postmark collecting, however, you must map out your way for yourself and blaze an entirely new trail.

The sycamore in both the native and Oriental forms is being urged for street planting by the State College of Forestry at Syracuse. Few trees will thrive as does the sycamore under adverse soil conditions and where the air is filled continually with coal smoke. The Oriental sycamore is better suited for general street planting than the native sycamore. The native sycamore has the drawback of shedding its bark more or less, especially as it reaches considerable age. The Oriental sycamore is especially suited to wide streets, and is almost as rapid in growth as the Carolina poplar, but, unlike the poplar, it has a clean habit of growth, is longer lived, and holds its leaves later in the autumn.

NEWS OF THE DAY

All the copper mines of the Anaconda Copper Company were forced to suspend operations the other night by the intense cold. The ore was frozen in the bins and cars, and it was impossible to transport it to the smelters.

Beginning Jan. 1, 1916, Denmark has introduced the twenty-four-hour system of computing time. In other words, 1 p.m. is to be termed 13 o'clock, and so on, until midnight, which will be 24 hours. This system, which eliminates all doubt as to whether a given hour refers to day or night time, has already been introduced in various European countries.

To best handle the enormous traffic which is now being moved over its lines the Baltimore and Ohio railroad has placed an order for approximately $4,000,000 worth of additional equipment for early delivery. The contract calls for the purchase of 3,000 steel hopper cars. Of this number an order for 2,000 cars will go to the Cambria Steel Company and 1,000 to the American Car and Foundry Company. The new order will bring the total number of cars purchased during the last few months up to approximately 10,000 cars.

It is reported that the Department of Agriculture is experimenting with wire grass as a source of supply for pulp for making paper, in place of poplar or liriodendron. This variety of grass grows on the Pacific Coast in western Mexico, and possesses the very desirable property of toughness and can be reduced by the soda process. It is stated that paper manufactured from the stock has proved as satisfactory, in physical tests, as a first-grade machine-finished printing paper. In appearance and in feeling, the paper produced is satisfactory. However, the experiments have indicated that more bleaching powder is required in the bleaching process than in the case of poplar stock.

Many edible flowers, it appears, are to be found in India. One of the most appreciated grows on a tree about which we have very little information, but which in the country itself is named the "mhowad." The natives consume an enormous number of these flowers, whose pale yellow corollæ are pulpy and thick, and prepare them in various ways. When they are fresh they are put in cakes, to which they give a sweet flavor, but they are more especially used for making bread after they have been dried and reduced to flour. By allowing them to ferment an agreeable wine is produced, and by distilling them a brandy is obtained of which the Hindus are very fond.

Even the smallest scratch on the hand sends a Bethlehem Steel Plant employee to the dispensary. There is no debating whether this or that hurt is sufficient to make the laborer stop work—it is compulsory that the doctors do the deciding. More than 90 out of every 100 men can immediately return to their work after the necessary medical precaution has been exercised. When it is recalled that injuries at first no more serious than a slight scratch may lead to the amputation of a limb or even death, the reason why 1,300 or more toilers visit the dispensary of the Bethlehem Steel Plant every week is at once apparent.

One of the most gratifying bits of information to be encountered in the Navy Year Book is the fact that 47,664 out of the 52,561 men on board the vessels of the navy were born in the Continental United States. Of the remainder 1,900 were born in our overseas possessions. This disposes effectually of the gibe heard repeatedly in past years—and even in recent months—in Continental countries that the United States navy is made up of foreigners. There may have been some cause for criticism in the old days, but now the best bone and sinew of the native population have flocked to the fo'c's'les, and no fleet in the world is manned by better or more homogeneous material than ours.

Berlin has started a new industry. Old, stained playing cards, all those slightly soiled which have only been once or twice in use, are collected from hotels, clubs and a hundred other establishments in Germany, Austria, Hungary, Switzerland and are cleaned and made as fresh as new. They are carefully rubbed with benzine on both sides, and then, after drying, placed in presses where they are rendered perfectly flat again. They are then sprinkled over with powdered whitelead and placed in a warm press, where they receive the finish and shine lost in the fingers of the players. They then find their way into another press, where the edges are carefully cut. Before being put on the market they undergo, each card separately, a careful revision to see that they are all "as good as new."

Not until his six-year-old grandson took him in charge did Peter Franklin McCubbin, of Virginia, eighty-two years old, ride on a railroad train. He passed through Kansas City the other day with the grandson, Morris Williamson, on the way to Salt Lake City, where he will live with his daughter, Morris' mother. At the Union Station Mr. McCubbin showed a keen interest in things around him and said he had enjoyed his trip a great deal. "It wasn't because I was afraid of trains that I didn't ride on them," he said. "I just never had occasion to go anywhere I couldn't drive. I raised a family of eight children, and, although they all insisted, I never went to see any of them. They usually came home once a year and saved me the trouble. My wife traveled considerably, considering, and one of my daughters has been to Europe, but I always got along fine on the farm. When I got tired there I would hitch up and drive to Pittsville, and if the conversation there didn't suit me I would drive over to Eldredge, twenty miles away."

INTERESTING ARTICLES

SPECIAL MOVIE SHOWS FOR CHILDREN.

Orrin G. Cocks, secretary of the National Board of Censors, told the Sunday-school class taught by John D. Rockefeller, Jr., that special days should be set aside for children in all moving picture shows where pictures that would not be injurious to their growing minds could be shown. The meeting was held in the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church.

"Parents have been criminal in their negligence in failing to see the tremendous effect of motion pictures on the mind of a child," said Mr. Cocks. "It has been too easy to hand out five cent., and the child has suffered. My work for the next few months will be to stir up parents and children's societies against the indiscriminate attendance of children at moving picture shows.

"The only solution is that certain pictures be shown to children at certain times, and that they be prohibited from attending the ordinary shows for adults. Moving picture exhibitors are willing to make and exhibit films for children when there is a demand."

WON HIS OWN CASE.

A few years ago an engineer on a Canadian railroad was tried for killing several passengers as a result of a rear-end collision between his engine and a passenger train ahead. His defense was simply that the weather was 40 degrees below zero, a 40-mile wind was blowing, the severity of which was greatly increased by the speed of his train and it was a human impossibility to withstand the cold long enough to get even a glimpse ahead from the open window. The other windows were so incrusted with ice that they might as well have been solid walls for all that could be seen through them.

The engineer won his own case on the strength of his testimony, but as a result of the case a mask was invented which eliminates the discomforts of looking forward in bitter cold weather and gives the engineer a clear and unobstructed vision, without even glass intervening. The result is secured by deflecting the air currents downward as they enter the mask, and by forming a suction or draft at the bottom all air is drawn away from the engineer's face. So perfect are the results secured that a match held at the back of the shield burns steadily. The space between the deflecting partitions at the top and those at the bottom of the mask is open and it is through this space that the engineer secures a clear view of the track ahead.

The device is being generally adopted by Canadian railroads as a safety measure and for the greater comfort of their enginemen.

RUSSIA HAS DRAFTED 5,000,000 MORE MEN.

Dr. Phillip Newton, of Washington, D. C., who returned the other day on the Baltic wearing the uniform of a brigadier-general in the Russian army and the Cross of St. Anne, which was bestowed upon him by the Czar, said that Russia had just drafted 5,000,000 men for war service and had 9,000,000 more in reserve ready to be called up. The doctor said he went to Russia at the beginning of the war to offer his services and was attached to the Forty-second Regiment of the Sixth Army and took part in the retreat from Warsaw.

"We started with 45,000 officers and men and only 3,500 survived the march. All the rest were either killed, wounded or captured," he said. "With the 5,000,000 troops recently drafted Russia has put altogether 9,000,000 men into the field and has an equal number of good troops in reserve. She is receiving plenty of ammunition from England, France, United States and Japan."

"Russia is getting a supply of big guns from Japan, and the irony of it is that she is sending to Moscow over the Trans-Siberian Railway the Krupp guns that were originally shipped from Hamburg to Japan. The outlook for Russia was better when I left Petrograd than it has been during the war."

He said he was attached to the big military hospital at Kiev, which was equipped with 600 beds and had treated 6,000 wounded men in ten months. After spending a month with his family in Washington, Dr. Newton will return to the War Office in Petrograd for orders.

GIANT SUBMARINES FAVORED.

Seagoing submarines of 2,000 tons displacement probably soon will be sought for the American navy as a result of lessons learned by Navy Department experts from the war and recent maneuvers of the Atlantic fleet. It is possible that the first five submarines included in the Administration's five-year building programme will approach this size, although the estimates submitted were based on boats of the 1,300-ton class.

In contrast to this development of a type of giant submersible, naval officers are inclined to believe that the so-called coast-defense boats will be standardized at about 400 tons displacement. The name should be, it is asserted, harbor defense rather than coast defense craft, as it has been demonstrated that the sphere of action of these boats is limited to 100 miles or less off-shore.

Twenty-five smaller submarines are included in the Administration programme for this year, at an estimated cost of between $600,000 and $700,000 each. The estimate would provide for vessels of 600 to 700 tons displacement. Increasing the size of the fleet of submarines and decreasing that of the smaller boats can be accomplished, it is pointed out, without altering the total expenditures proposed.

Some officers, it is said, believe the smaller submarines should be abandoned, but others believe it has been shown that there are two distinct fields of activity for submarines which should be recognized. In shallow waters off the coast, it is contended, the big boats would be almost useless because of their draught.

TAKE NOTICE!

Itch Powder, Bombs and Cachoo cannot be sent by mail. Only orders for these goods amounting to one dollar will be accepted, as delivery will have to be made by express.

GOOD LUCK BANKS.

Ornamental as well as useful. Made of highly nickelized brass. It holds just One Dollar. When filled it opens itself. Remains locked until refilled. Can be used as a watchcharm. Money refunded if not satisfied. Price, 10c. by mail.

H. F. LANG, 1815 Centre St., B'klyn, N. Y.

TRICK COIN HOLDER.

The coin holder is attached to a ring made so as to fit anyone's finger. The holder clasps tightly a 25c. piece. When the ring is placed on the finger with the coin showing on the palm of the hand and offered in change it cannot be picked up. A nice way to tip people. Price by mail, postpaid, 10c. each.

WOLFF NOVELTY CO., 29 W. 26th St., N. Y.

THE FRIGHTFUL RATTLESNAKE!

To all appearance it is a harmless piece of coiled paper with a mouth-piece attachment, but upon placing it to one's mouth, and blowing into the tube, an imitation snake over two feet in length springs out of the roll like a flash of lightning, producing a whistling, fluttering sound that would frighten a wild Indian. We guarantee our rattlesnake not to bite, but would not advise you to play the joke on timid women or delicate children. Each snake packed in a box. Price, 10c.; 3 for 25c., mailed postpaid.

WOLFF NOVELTY CO., 29 W. 26th St., N. Y.

RIDER AGENTS WANTED

in each town to ride and exhibit sample 1916 "Ranger" Bicycle. Write for special offer. We Ship on Approval without a cent deposit, allow 30 DAYS FREE TRIAL, actual riding test, and prepay freight on every bicycle. LOWEST PRICES on bicycles, tires and sundries. Do not buy until you receive our catalogs and learn our unheard of prices and marvelous special offer. Tires, coaster-brake rear wheels, lamps, parts, sundries. half usual prices. MEAD CYCLE CO., Dept. L188 CHICAGO, ILL.

GREENBACKS

Pack of $1,000 Stage Bills 10c; 3 packs, 25c. Send for a pack and show the boys what a WAD you carry.

C. A. NICHOLS, JR., Box 90, Chi., N. Y.

EASY MONEY

Flash our "Millionaire's Bank Roll" and make 'em all "rubber." These goods are made in Washington and are dandies. Easy money handling them. Send 10 cents quick for sample "wad" and Big Catalog

Address LOCK BOX 156 A Winona, Minnesota

10c

THE INK BLOT JOKER.

Fool Your Friends. The greatest novelty of the age! Have a joke which makes everybody laugh. More fun than any other novelty that has been shown in years. Place it on a desk, tablecloth, or any piece of furniture, as shown in the above cut, near some valuable papers, or on fine wearing apparel. Watch the result! Oh, Gee! Price, 15c. each, postpaid.

WOLFF NOVELTY CO., 29 W. 26th St., N. Y.

SURPRISE MOVING-PICTURE MACHINE.

It consists of a small nickelized metal tube, 4½ inches long, with a lens eye-view, which shows a pretty ballet girl or any other scene. Hand it to a friend who will be delighted with the first picture, tell him to turn the screw on the side of the instrument, to change the views, when a stream of water squirts in his face, much to his surprise. The instrument can be refilled with water in an instant, and one filling will suffice for four or five victims.

Price, 30c. each by mail, postpaid; 4 for $1.00.

H. F. LANG, 1815 Centre St., B'klyn, N. Y.

X RAY CURIO 15 CTS

NEW SCIENTIFIC WONDER

With this instrument you apparently see the bones in your hand, lead in a pencil, see thru cloth, wood &c. Have no end of fun. Get one today. Price 15c. 2-25c

Address STAR CO. Dept. 30. CHICAGO, ILL.

CHAPLIN DANCER 10C

Boys and girls if you want to see a regular circus get this funniest of funny clown dancers. Charlie stands 15 inches high and will dance, jig, roll his eyes, throw his arm and cane and wiggle his funny mustache as natural as life. You all know Charlie. He will entertain the whole family for weeks. Price 10c. STAR CO. Dept. 45, CHICAGO.

$36. MEX. MONEY 50C

Genuine Mexican Currency as issued by forces of General Francisco Villa. These bills make fine souvenirs of the Mexican Revolution. 50c, $1, $5, $10 and $20 bills 25 cents each or all 5 for 50c. Selling fast. STAR CO. Dept. M. CHICAGO, ILL.

100 Chaplin Cards 10c

Funniest Cards out, all showing Charlie Chaplin's Comic Capers. A regular scream. Pass them to your friends and have 100 big laughs. We send 100 Chaplin Cards and the new Chaplin Clown Joke Book for 10 cents, STAR CO., CHICAGO.

Chas. Chaplin Outfit 10c

False Mustache, Im. Gold Shell Tooth, Voice Thrower, Sport Ring, Chaplin Stick Pin, 9 Hot Air Cards, Joke Book, Trick Book, Roll Stage Money and Catalog of 1000 Tricks, quizzes etc. THIS ENTIRE OUTFIT sent postpaid for TEN CENTS. Fun for a year. STAR CO. 19 Clinton Chicago to gain and maintain the affection of another? Send for a package of our wonderful Oriental Powder with full directions for use. Harmless. Lasting. Guaranteed. Price 10 CENTS; 3 packages 25c. Book of Private Tips free with each.

You Wish

Address STAR CO., 29 Clinton St. CHICAGO.

BOYS

Get a bundle of STAGE GREENBACKS and have the time of your life. Looks like the real stuff. Flash a roll on your friends and be popular. Girls will be after you too. Big roll of 20 Bills 10c; 8 rolls 25c. postpaid STAR CO., 26 Clinton St. CHICAGO.

WE WANT YOU TO READ "Moving Picture Stories"

A Weekly Magazine devoted to Photoplays and Players

Absolutely the finest little publication on the news-stands

PRICE 5 CENTS A COPY

ISSUED EVERY FRIDAY

BEAUTIFUL COLORED COVER DESIGNS

THIRTY-TWO PAGES

FINE HALF-TONE FRONTISPICES

New portraits of actors and actresses every week

Get a copy of this weekly magazine and see what it is

EVERY NUMBER CONTAINS

Six Gripping Stories, based on the latest and best films, each profusely illustrated with fine half-tones of scenes in the plays.

Photographs and Biographies of the most celebrated Photoplay actors and actresses.

Special Articles relating to Moving Pictures, written by the greatest authorities in the film business.

News Notes from the studios about the doings of everybody of prominence connected with the Photoplays.

Scenario Hints and the names of all the companies who may buy the plays you write.

Poems, Jingles, Jests and every bright feature calculated to interest both young and old.

GET A COPY NOW from your newsdealer, or send us 5 cents in money or postage stamps, and we will mail you the latest number issued.

"MOVING PICTURE STORIES," Inc.

168 West 23d Street

New York

WILD WEST

WEEKLY

A MAGAZINE CONTAINING STORIES. SKETCHES Etc. OF WESTERN LIFE.

FRANK TOUSEY, PUBLISHER, 168 WEST 23D STREET, NEW YORK

No. 697.

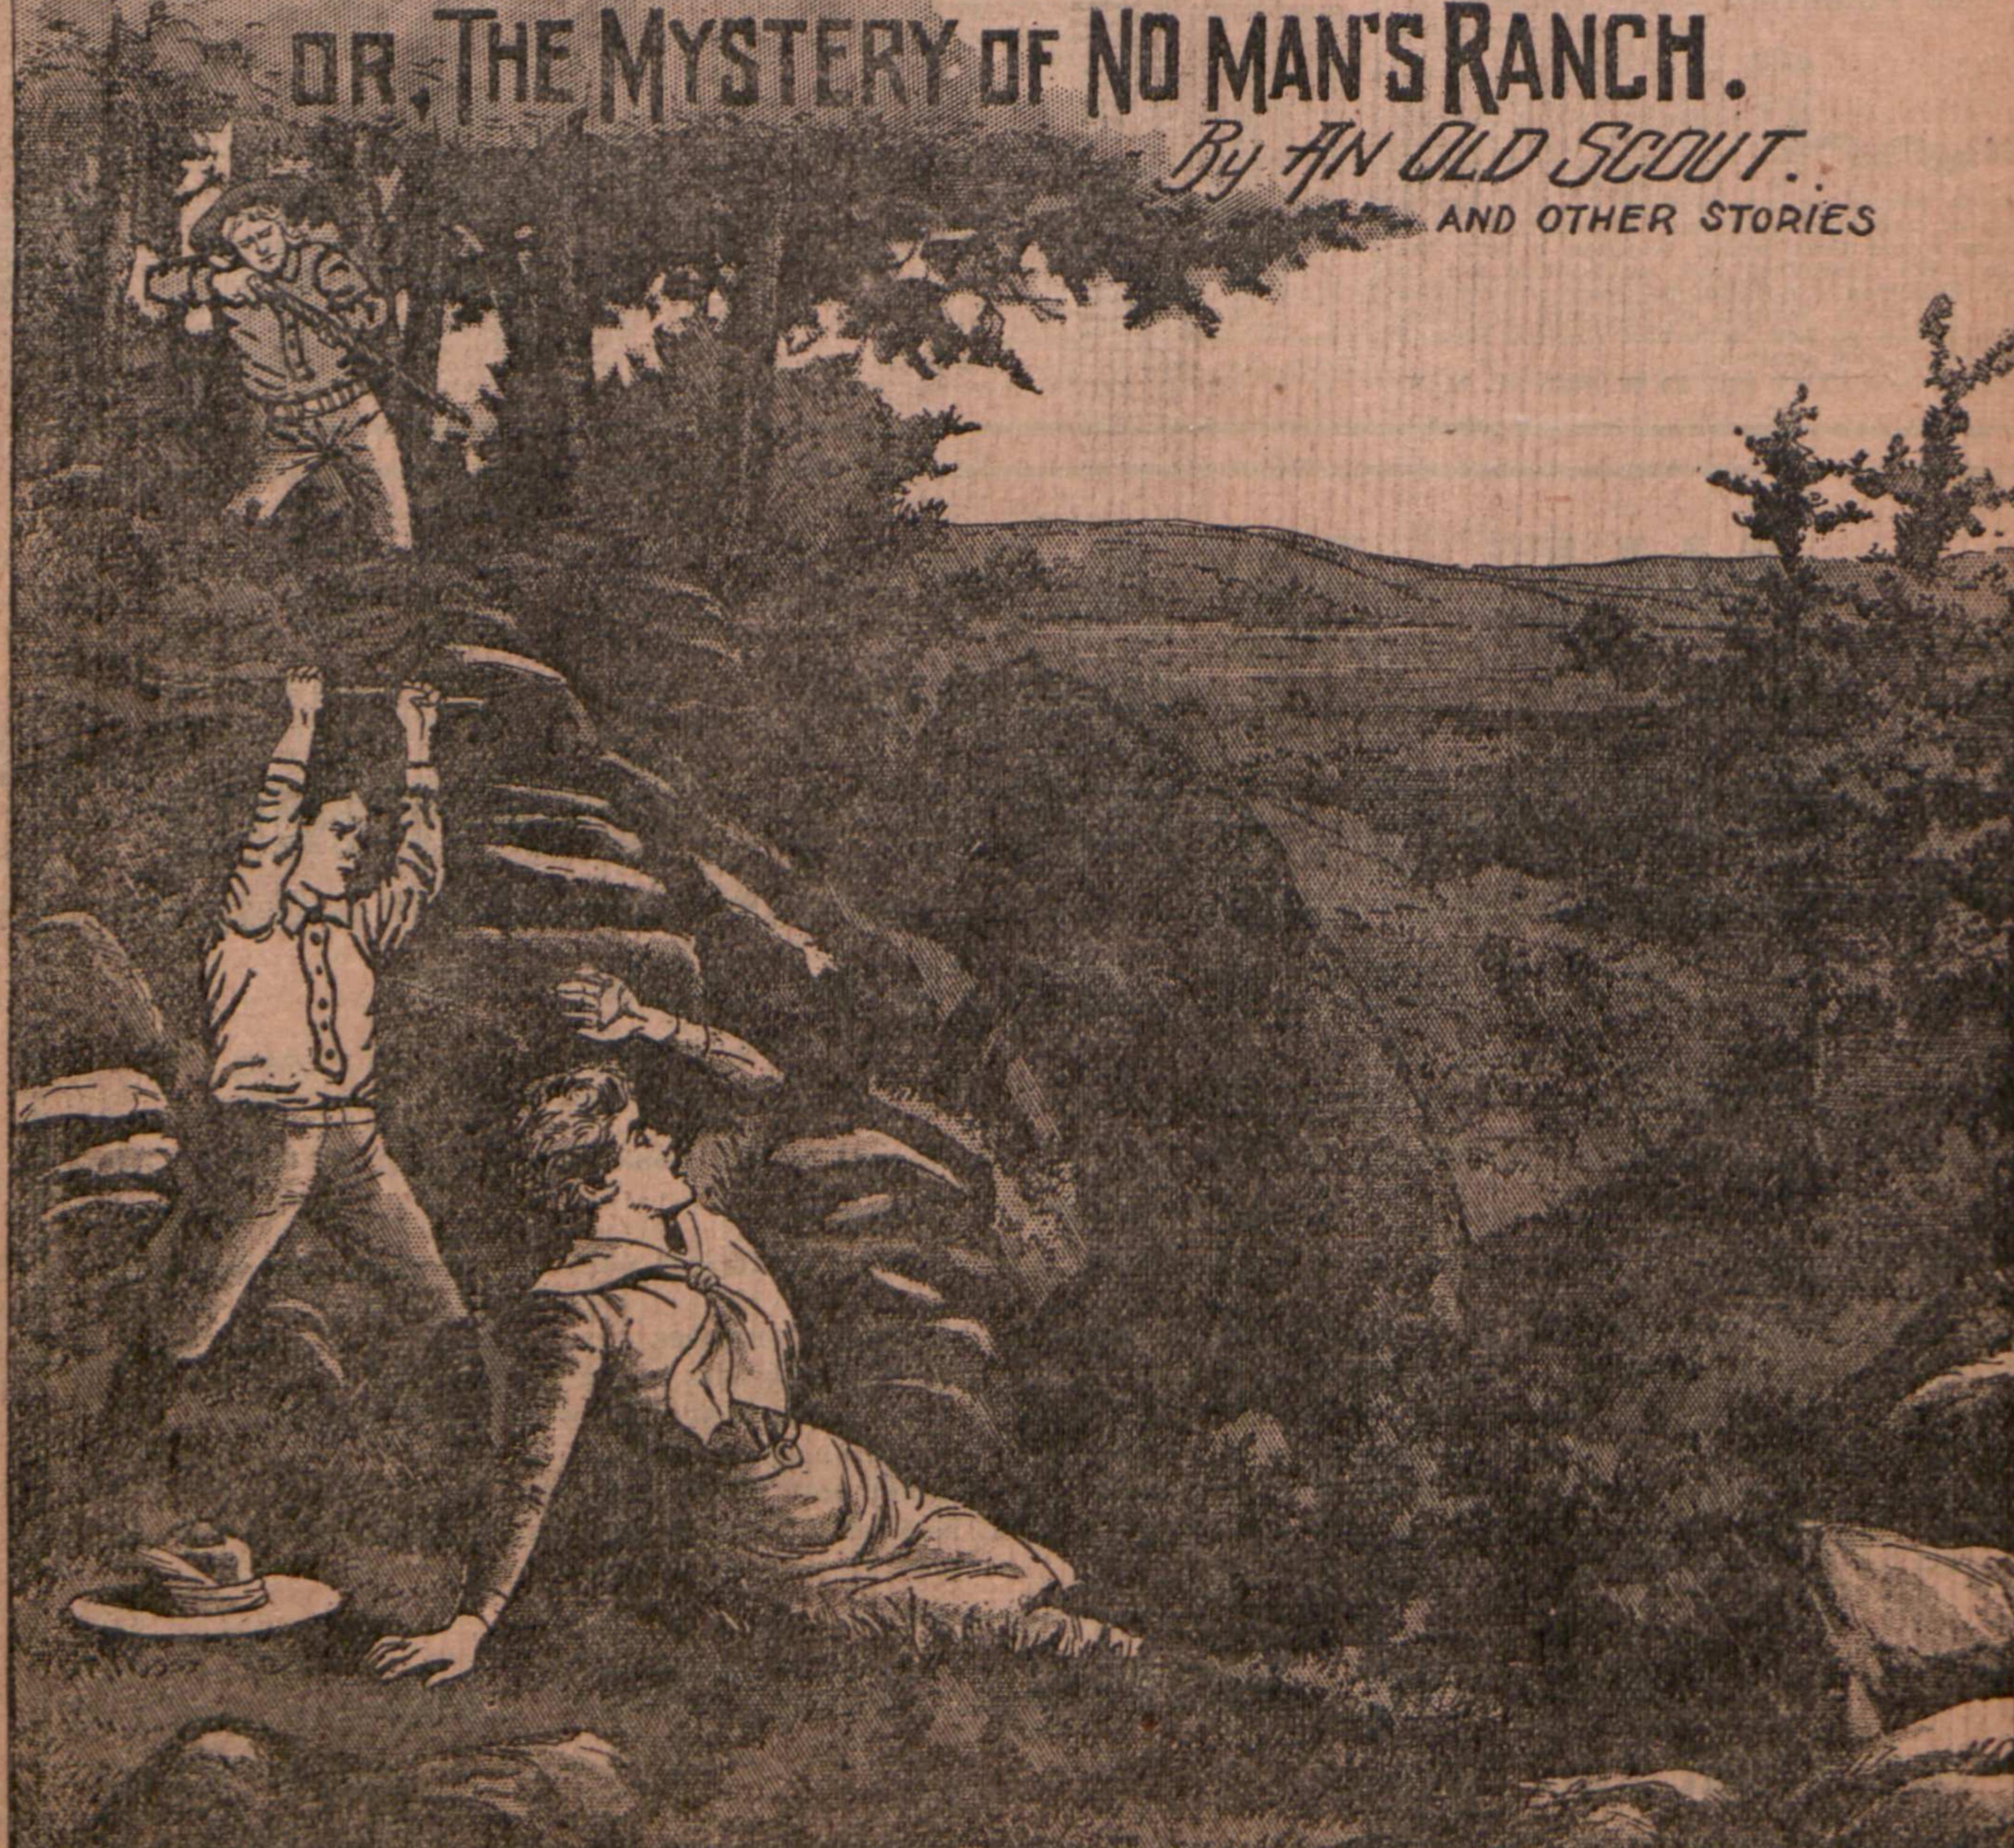

NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 25, 1916.

Price 5 Cents.

YOUNG WILD WEST AND THE PRAIRIE PEARL OR, THE MYSTERY OF NO MAN'S RANCH.

By AN OLD SCOUT.

AND OTHER STORIES

FAME AND FORTUNE WEEKLY

—LATEST ISSUES—

478 In the Copper Field; or, The Mine That Made the Money.
 479 From a Cent to a Fortune; or, A Chicago Boy's Great Scoop.
 480 A Start in Life; or, A Poor Boy's Rise to Fame.
 481 A Wide Awake Boy; or, Born With a Winning Streak.
 482 Capturing the Money; or, How Ben Balley Made His Mark.
 483 Digging for Gold; or, The Luck of a Boy Miner.
 484 A Boy With Grit; or, Earning An Honest Living.
 485 Andy, the Mill Boy; or, Rising to the Top.
 486 Fame Before the Footlights; or, The Boy Who Bossed the Theater.
 487 Lucky Lee, the Office Boy; or, The Nerviest Lad in New York.
 488 Sure to Get Rich; or, A Smart Young Messenger.
 489 Pushing it Through; or, The Fate of a Lucky Boy.
 490 A Born Speculator; or, The Young Sphinx of Wall Street.
 491 The Way to Success; or, The Boy Who Got There.
 492 Struck Oil; or, The Boy Who Made a Million.
 493 A Golden Risk; or, The Young Miners of Della Cruz.
 494 A Sure Winner; or, The Boy Who Went Out With a Circus.
 495 Golden Fleece; or, The Boy Brokers of Wall Street.
 496 A Madcap Scheme; or, The Boy Treasure Hunters of Cocos Island.
 497 Adrift on the World; or, Working His Way to Fortune.
 498 Playing to Win; or, The Foxiest Boy in Wall Street.
 499 Tatters; or, A Boy from the Slums.
 500 A Young Monte Cristo; or, The Richest Boy in the World.
 501 Won by Pluck; or, The Boys Who Ran a Railroad.
 502 Beating the Brokers; or, The Boy Who "Couldn't Be Done."
 503 A Rolling Stone; or, The Brightest Boy on Record.
 504 Never Say Die; or, The Young Surveyor of Happy Valley.
 505 Boss of the Market; or, The Greatest Boy in Wall Street.
 506 The Chance of His Life; or, The Young Pilot of Crystal Lake.
 507 Striving for Fortune; or, From Bell-Boy to Millionaire.
 508 Out for Business; or, The Smartest Boy in Town.
 509 A Favorite of Fortune; or, Striking It Rich in Wall Street.
 510 Through Thick and Thin; or, The Adventures of a Smart Boy.

For sale by all newsdealers, or will be sent to any address on receipt of price, 5 cents per copy, in money or postage stamps, by

FRANK TOUSEY, Publisher,

168 West 23d St., New York.

IF YOU WANT ANY BACK NUMBERS of our weeklies and cannot procure them from newsdealers, they can be obtained from this office direct. Write out and fill in your Order and send it to us with the price of the weeklies you want and we will send them to you by return mail. POSTAGE STAMPS TAKEN THE SAME AS MONEY.

FRANK TOUSEY, Publisher,

168 West 23d St., New York.

OUR TEN-CENT HANDBOOKS

No. 1. NAPOLEON'S ORACULUM AND BEEHAM BOOK.—Containing the great oracle of human destiny; also the true meaning of almost any kind of dreams, together with charms, ceremonies, and curious games of cards.

No. 2. HOW TO DO TRICKS.—The great book of magic and card tricks, containing full instruction on all the leading card tricks of the day, also the most popular magical illusions as performed by our leading magicians; every boy should obtain a copy of this book.

No. 3. HOW TO FLIRT.—The arts and wiles of flirtation are fully explained by this little book. Besides the various methods of handkerchief, fan, glove, parasol, window and hat flirtation, it contains a full list of the language and sentiment of flowers.

No. 4. HOW TO DANCE is the title of this little book. It contains full instructions in the art of dancing, etiquette in the ballroom and at parties, how to dance, and full directions for calling off in all popular square dances.

No. 5. HOW TO MAKE LOVE.—A complete guide to love, courtship and marriage, giving sensible advice, rules and etiquette to be observed, with many curious and interesting things not generally known.

No. 6. HOW TO BECOME AN ATHLETE.—Giving full instruction for the use of dumb-bells, Indian clubs, parallel bars, horizontal bars and various other methods of developing a good, healthy muscle; containing over sixty illustrations.

No. 7. HOW TO KEEP BIRDS.—Handsomely illustrated and containing full instructions for the management and training of the canary, mockingbird, bobolink, blackbird, paroquet, parrot, etc.

No. 8. HOW TO BECOME A VENTRILIQUE.—By Harry Kennedy. Every intelligent boy reading this book of instructions can master the art, and create any amount of fun for himself and friends. It is the greatest book ever published.

No. 9. HOW TO BOX.—The art of self-defense made easy. Containing over thirty illustrations of guards, blows, and the different positions of a good boxer. Every boy should obtain one of these useful and instructive books, as it will teach you how to box without an instructor.

No. 10. HOW TO WRITE LOVE-LETTERS.—A most complete little book, containing full directions for writing love-letters, and when to use them, giving specimen letters for young and old.

No. 11. HOW TO WRITE LETTERS TO LADIES.—Giving complete instructions for writing letters to ladies on all subjects; also letters of introduction, notes and requests.

No. 12. HOW TO DO IT; OR, BOOK OF

For sale by all newsdealers, or will be sent to any address on receipt of price, 10 cts. per copy, or 3 for 25 cts., in money or postage stamps, by

FRANK TOUSEY, Publisher,

</div